Iran accused of incitement to genocide

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz drew a capacity crowd of 3,000 to the Truth, Light and Freedom Rally at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto last week to speak about the danger Iran poses to Israel and the rest of the world.

Speaking in response to the recent Holocaust denial conference in Iran and Iran's goal to develop nuclear weapons, Dershowitz, an outspoken defender of Israel, said that although Holocaust denial is about the past, it is used to influence the present and the future.

"The purpose of Holocaust denial is to delegitimate Israel, to demonize Jews and to legitimate attacks on Israel and attacks on Jews," Dershowitz said.

He added that because of the world's obsession with Israel, Jews are not the only victims, as other issues in the world, such as the genocides in Cambodia, Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia, and the current genocide in Darfur, have been largely ignored by the international community.

"Six million additional people have died since the end of the Second World War because of this obsessive focus on Israel," Dershowitz said.

The rally, which was webcast around the world on Dec. 21, the seventh night of Chanukah, was organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Speakers at the rally, hosted by author and National Post columnist Linda Frum Sokolowski, included Canada's minister of intergovernmental affairs Peter Van Loan; Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant;

Canadian youth bond with IDF soldiers

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — This Chanukah, 30 Canadian Jewish youth aged 18 to 26 got a special gift.

Not only were they selected to go on a birthright israel trip, but they were chosen for the Canada Israel Experience (CIE) Extreme Desert Adventure trip – the only tour of its kind to include the full participation of Israeli soldiers.

Since they arrived in Israel on Dec. 15, the Canadian participants have gone rappelling down the Ramon Crater, mountain biking along the Jordan River, ATVing (all-terrain vehicles) in the Upper Galilee, and on an extended camel trek in the desert with a group of 11 Israel Defence Forces soldiers, each hailing from a different elite army unit.

"What makes this trip so special is the fact that it's a 10-day mifgash with Israelis, whereas with most birthright israel trips, the meeting lasts a maximum of five days," says Aviad Amitai, a CIE tour guide.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Province Aids JNF

WINNIPEG — The government of Manitoba recently presented the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) with a cheque for $330,000 as part of a $1-million commitment to jointly fund agricultural, water conservation, forest diversification and research projects in Israel and northern Manitoba. JNF has pledged to raise another $1 million for the projects over the next three years.

Cuba Mitzvah

VANCOUVER — A group of friends will head to the small Jewish community of Santiago in southeastern Cuba later this month as part of their vision of tikkun olam (repairing the world). They are planning to bring donated Hebrew books, religious objects like kippot and tallitot, as well as health products for the 100-member Jewish community. During their three-week stay, they will teach Hebrew, Israeli dancing and participate in religious services.

WORLD

Soccer for Peace

SEVILLE — An Andalusian select team last week defeated a joint Israeli-Palestinian side 3-1 in the Match for Peace at the Olympic Stadium in Seville, Spain. Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres kicked off the game, which was organized by the Peres Center for Peace. A couple of hours before the game began, Peres, Palestinian official Jibril Rajoub and prime minister of the Andalusian Regional Government, Manual Chavez, held a joint press conference and pledged to continue to promote peace through sports.

Appeal Rejected

WASHINGTON — The top U.S. immigration board has rejected John Demjanjuk's appeal from a 2005 deportation order. Demjanjuk, a former Nazi death camp guard who was acquitted in Israel in 1993 of being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible" of Treblinka, had claimed he would be tortured if returned to his native Ukraine. Demjanjuk, 86, may still appeal the decision in federal courts. U.S. immigration courts have found that Demjanjuk had been trained as a death camp guard, even if he wasn't Ivan.

Irving Unapologetic

LONDON — British writer David Irving wasted no time offending Jews and black people at a London news conference a day after his return from Austria where he was imprisoned for denying the Holocaust. Irving endorsed actor Mel Gibson's drunken comments that Jews were responsible for all modern wars. Irving, 68, had been sentenced to three years in prison for his views on the Holocaust, but Vienna's highest court granted the Holocaust denier's appeal to convert two-thirds of his sentence into probation. He was deported to Britain and banned from Austria.

Benedict Eyes Zion

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI said in a Christmas sermon that he wants to visit the Holy Land and pray in Jerusalem. Israeli Prime Ehud Olmert said the Pope should await a calmer political situation. The pope's predecessor, John Paul II, visited Israel, the Palestinian Authority and Jordan in 2000.

Aloha Menorah

NEW YORK — A Hawaii county erected a Christmas tree to protect a Chanukah menorah from a church-state separation challenge. The American Civil Liberties Union, citing laws that prohibit endorsing one particular religion, had complained to Maui County after seeing the menorah, accompanied by a dreidel, in front of the county building. County workers scrambled to find a Christmas tree, in short supply in Hawaii late in the season. One was found at a local botanical garden.

Canada Backs Resolution on Iran

OTTAWA — Canada has pledged to implement a recent UN Security Council resolution that adopted a number of sanctions on Iran for failing to suspend its nuclear enrichment program.

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said that "Canada will ensure that all measures contained in the resolution are implemented through Canadian domestic law within the 60-day deadline and urges all UN member states to do likewise.

"Canada calls on Iran to comply fully with the measures elaborated in Resolution 1737 and to return to negotiations on a long-term comprehensive settlement that balances Iran's rights and obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty."

The resolution requires all UN member states, including Canada, to take measures to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of all items, materials, equipment, goods and technology that could contribute to Iran's enrichment-related, reprocessing or heavy-water-related activities.

The resolution does not permit the use of force if Iran does not comply. Iran rejected the decision, calling the sanctions illegal and vowing to continue its nuclear program.

Community faces foster care shortage

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family & Child Service is facing a critical shortage of foster homes for children of all ages, says the agency's supervisor of placement resources.

"Our mandate is to place Jewish kids with Jewish families, and there are more kids than homes. We are calling on the community to help us," said Sheryl Ederman.

JF&CS is open to different kinds of families, she said, and to people who may want to foster for short or long terms, or only on weekends.

Foster care co-ordinator Selma Elzas said the agency is looking for people who can foster children from infancy to age 16, but will be happy to work with those who, for example, want only small children or teenagers. "Sometimes we need homes for semi-independent teens – not considered a foster home – who need a transition into independent living."

JF&CS would like stay-at-home foster mothers for babies, she said, because the agency tries to support visits from birth parents, and that's easier to arrange during the day.

Elzas said the agency is trying to expand its list of potential foster parents, because it wants to be able to find suitable matches for children. "If we don't have enough potential parents, we are forced to ask people to do what they're not comfortable doing."

JF&CS responds to auditor general's report

Please see page 6

Application packages are available at the agency's information session, she said. "The application process includes a criminal-record check, a medical report, a home study and personal references. After it's approved, parents go through a training session."

The process takes about four months, Elzas said, but parts of it may be done retroactively. "If a home has been approved, we may place a child even if the parent has not yet completed the training session."

Foster parents receive compensation for room and board, and for expenses such as camp, clothing, school supplies, prescriptions and therapy.

"This might help ease the decision for families on a tight budget. People need to realize that they don't have to give their heart, soul and budget to help out. There are all kinds of ways to do it," she said.

"Foster parents are people who love kids and who want to make a difference. Most of these kids – some are medically fragile or have developmental issues – have had painful experiences. They have [witnessed] mental health problems, substance abuse or physical illness. A foster parent is able to make their lives better. When they see how they have impacted a child's life, they know why they decided to foster."

The ultimate goal is to return the kids to their own home, "as long as it is a safe situation. We believe that is where they belong."

If foster parents have a fear of becoming "too attached, we remind them that if the kids are returning home, that is a good thing. We also encourage an ongoing relationship. Children can visit their foster parents, and often accept that they have a foster family and their own family."

Suzie, a teacher and a JF&CS foster mother, has been taking in children for five years, "some long term, and others for brief periods," she said.

"I began fostering when I became concerned about one of my students. I contacted JF&CS, but I didn't think that I could foster, because I am a single parent.

"They told me immediately that they welcome all kinds of families."

She becomes frustrated, she said, when people act surprised that her foster children are Jewish. "They don't understand that the same problems exist in our community. Everything we read about in the paper also goes on in Jewish homes."

Tatiana, a former foster child, said she lived with her own parents until she was 12 years old. "Then my sister was born, and [authorities] discovered she was not being cared for properly.

"I came from a world where there was not enough food, and no one cared what I did at school. I wouldn't have made it through school if it wasn't for my foster parents. They opened the door for me to go to university."

For information on being a foster parent, call JF&CS at 416-638-7800, ext. 298.

A writer's writer

From the editor's desk

Michael Redhill is a writer's writer. Barely into his fifth decade, he is the author of three books of prose, five books of poetry and eight works of drama. He is also the publisher and one of the editors of Brick, A Literary Journal, published twice yearly in Canada by Cypress Avenue Inc.

It is immediately evident, by a quick tour through the man's curriculum vitae and more directly, through conversation with him, that he cares deeply about literature, the exchange of ideas and the telling of stories.

"Who chooses to tell a story and for what reason," he recently told The CJN, matter a great deal to him.

Over light breakfast in a downtown Toronto café, the distinguished author/playwright recently expounded upon the thoughtful story he has told in his most recent book, Consolation, and upon his reasons for telling it.

In the same manner that Glen Rotchin's book The Rent Collector (reviewed last year in this column) is also very much about the city of Montreal, Consolation is also very much about the city of Toronto. The term also is quite appropriate in these cases, because the two books cover a great deal more literary territory than their respective urban and municipical settings

In his deep basso voice, Redhill told The CJN, "I want this book to generate a discussion about who we are building this city for." But that question cannot be properly answered, Redhill suggested without first understanding the city's past. Yet, in respect of this past, he laments that "it's hard to get a sense of history in Toronto."

In the book, he characterizes this omission with greater piquancy: "Neglect of the past is a form of despair."

And so, as a form of guerrilla fighting against the enemy of despair, the award-winning Redhill has spun a poignant tale – in two distinct, but interrelated narrative parts – of the city's early mid-19th century beginnings and of the ultimately sorrowful efforts of a local university professor to chronicle those beginnings.

J.G.Hallam, an English apothecary, is sent by his father in 1856 to the cold, faraway outpost of the Empire that was then Toronto, to establish a branch of the family's London apothecary business. By twists of luck, both ill and fortuitous, Hallam eventually casts aside his mortar and pestle in favour of photographer's equipment. He ultimately endeavours to capture the quickly rising shapes and images of the burgeoning city. Alas, the photographic record is lost in a storm on Lake Ontario.

Prof. David Hollis, a century and a half later, attempts to retrieve Hallam's photographs. But he becomes lost, as it were, in a storm of his own. He fails due to the increasing physical enfeeblement and debilitation brought about by the onset of amyotropic lateral sclerosis, Lou Gehrig's disease.

Michael Redhill

Like all good stories, however, Consolation has many points of exploration. Redhill hinted at another one of these in the book during our breakfast conversation: "Our lives have the appearance of solidity, but they can so easily be shattered."

The novel poignantly delves into this theme through Hollis' ALS and its attendant personal and familial upheaval.

Redhill masterfully depicts the tensions, the heartaches and the emotional complications wrought by the particularly cruel, insidious disease.

"She didn't feel like fighting him, and she popped open the two compartments that said '4 p.m.' and '7 p.m.' and tilted the case into his hand. He took them one by one, placing them near the back of his throat on his thick greyish tongue and he washed them down with water. One round red, two long thin yellows, a pentagram in blue, a tiny white pill, one after the other like the beads on an abacus vanishing down into the dark of him, pills to count days by. When done, he opened his mouth wide and moved his tongue around, like a prisoner."

In the Hallam narrative, Redhill deftly, achingly portrays the devastating loneliness Hallam endures as a result of the bleak, grey, frozen Toronto winter and the physical separation from his wife and children who are so far away from him in London.

"But otherwise, his pleasures were restricted to mealtaking and sleep induction... When the dark was full enough and he could begin to feel the little waves of panic lap at him – these little waves like childhood fears and their attendant revelations of utter loneliness, the feeling that there was nothing safe in the world, not one's favourite foods, nor one's parents or friends, nor the promise of getting older and being able to do whatever one wanted, there was no succor in any of this because it was dark and night was beginning."

The sheer writing skill and breadth of imagination of hardworking, talented authors such as Redhill are a source both of pride and of engaging reading experiences.

A nuclear Iran seen as 'dangerous' for the world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The possibility that Iran might acquire nuclear weapons has been described as a perilous prospect by Dennis Ross, the former chief American diplomat in the Middle East.

"If Iran goes nuclear, the world will be a more dangerous and unpredictable place," he warned UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Emergency Campaign late last month in a keynote speech.

Dennis Ross

Speaking at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, Ross said that Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal is "a truly existential question" for Israel and of great concern to Arab states such as Saudi Arabia.

"Saudi Arabia and Israel share the same enemy, Iran," he said.

Iran's determination to become a member of the nuclear club can be nipped in the bud, said Ross, who played a role in brokering three diplomatic landmarks: Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, Israel's 1995 interim agreement with the Palestinian Authority and Israel's 1997 redeployment from the West Bank town of Hebron.

"It's not impossible to prevent Iran from going nuclear," he said, suggesting that sanctions might work, since Iran is vulnerable to economic pressure.

His assessment of Iran's vulnerability flew in the face of a recent prediction by the director of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, that Iran will be a nuclear power by 2009 or 2010.

Ross, who is currently director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy and a foreign affairs analyst for the Fox TV network, accused Iran of trying to subvert Arab governments by supporting and funding such Islamic movements as Hezbollah and Hamas.

In a general commentary on the possibilities of peace in the Mideast today, Ross said the region no longer needs "grand initiatives" that may prove to be hollow but rather "practical initiatives" that have a chance of succeeding.

Ross, who tirelessly promoted Mideast peacemaking on behalf of two U.S. presidents, George Bush Sr. and Bill Clinton, said that the era of Israeli unilateral withdrawals from Arab territory, as exemplified by the pullout from the Gaza Strip, has drawn to a close.

Israel's "gesture" of withdrawing from Gaza was regarded as a sign of weakness by the Arabs, he said.

Calling for a "diplomacy of reality" based not only on photo opportunities, Ross said all parties to the Arab-Israeli dispute must be prepared to make difficult decisions if peace is to prevail.

He cited Saudi Arabia's 2002 peace plan – which the Israeli government formally rejected – as a significant development in that it held out the promise of formal relations between Israel and the Arab world in exchange for a full Israeli withdrawal from Arab lands and a resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem.

Taking issue with one of the conclusions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which released its report last month, Ross said there is no linkage between the Arab-Israeli conflict and the current sectarian violence in Iraq.

Neither the present Sunni insurgency nor the rise of Shiite militias can be attributed to Israel's dispute with the Palestinians.

Nevertheless, the festering Palestinian problem should be dealt with on its own merits, he added.

Ross said the West should support Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as a "moderate alternative" to the Islamist Hamas government, which was elected last January in a landslide victory.

"We'll be in a much worse situation if the Palestinians are defined by Hamas," he noted.

Ross also disagreed with the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that Syria and Iran should be encouraged to work for stability in Iraq in return for certain concessions.

In a dig at Jimmy Carter's new and controversial book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, Ross suggested that the former U.S. president had rewritten history in asserting that Israel's offer to the Palestinians at the 2000 Camp David summit had been insufficient.

Ross, a participant in those negotiations who later wrote an account about it in the book The Missing Peace, inferred that Carter's book perpetuates "mythology."

Having just returned from a trip to Israel, Ross praised Israel for its "resiliency" in rebuilding the Galilee after its bombardment by Hezbollah rockets in last summer's 34-day war.

Ross was recently appointed the first chairman of the Institute for Jewish People Policy Planning, a new think tank in Jerusalem that was founded and funded by the Jewish Agency.

JF&CS responds to auditor general's CAS report

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family & Child Service is listening with receptive ears to the auditor general's concerns about expenditures at children's aid societies, says executive director Richard Cummings.

The recently released "value-for-money audit" on four of the provinces's children's aid societies – in Toronto, Peel, York and Thunder Bay – raised, among other things, concerns about delays in making child welfare investigations, senior managers receiving high-end sports utility vehicles to use for work, and trips to the Caribbean by staff members and children under care.

JF&CS is one of 52 member agencies of the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies, and Cummings said he understands that JF&CS needs to makes sure that his agency continues to be in line with government standards, and that all kids are seen in a timely manner, despite staffing shortages.

Ontario children's aid societies have about 82,000 children in the system at any one time, and more than 30,000 in any given year come into foster care, said Cummings.

Workload is an enormous issue, but numbers at JF&CS are not as high as at other agencies– it has 90 children in care and about 440 investigations in a year – because "we have alternatives to bringing children into care," he said.

"We can enter a family's life earlier, because we have family and children's mental health services. We can step in before serious issues lead to [taking children into care.] With less kids in care, we can also respond earlier."

JF&CS' response is different from the "get go" he said. "We are present in their lives when prevention is possible."

Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services, said that with regard to the timeliness of investigations, provincial standards require agencies to respond to child welfare cases in 12 hours or seven days. "If it is urgent, it is always within 12 hours."

Although JF&CS doesn't have adequate staffing, he said, it has never had a child at risk because of a workload issue.

"The ministry sets rigorous standards, yet they are not funding us adequately," Hurwitz said. "Caseload sizes need to be smaller. Reducing each worker's caseload to 20 cases from 25 a week would be a significant reduction."

Currently, he said, staff members have difficulty keeping up with the required paperwork, but the government "is looking at trying to reduce the onerous administrative tasks workers have had to complete."

Hurwitz said that the auditor general's report on CAS spending practices doesn't pertain to JF&CS, because "we are cautious with our financial resources. We are ethical and conservative in our spending, particularly as it relates to travel and agency vehicles."

Cummings said that when the auditor general talked about CAS workers accompanying children on trips, he should have emphasized that they were trying to reunite the children with their parents.

He said that his agency is accredited every four years by the American-based Council on Accreditation (COA), and it's accountable to its board of directors, and to its three main funding bodies – the government, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and United Way.

"They have their own standards to ensure that we are [acting] in the best interests of children and families."

Cummings said that the child welfare problems the agency faces are the same problems that other communities face.

"Jewish families are not spared. We see drugs, alcohol abuse and domestic violence. These problems are sadly democratic."

It saddens him, he said, to see so much being made about the areas of concern identified by the auditor general, "but little is being paid to the good, ethical work that people are engaged in to keep people safe."

Hurwitz said that all CAS staff members take the safety of children and families seriously, and they strive to achieve a balance of service and administrative work.

"The administrative piece is important. We have to be out there, but we also have to be accountable."

'We should act preventively, not only reactively'

Father Raymond De Souza, a Catholic priest, and Holocaust survivors Martin Maxwell and Max Eisen.

Frum Sokolowski warned that although the Holocaust denial conference in Iran was attended by a "roster of losers and weirdos," the Iranian threat needs to be taken seriously.

Van Loan received a standing ovation after denouncing anti-Israel bias being freely expressed by members of Parliament and reinforced the Canadian government's stance on Israel's right to defend itself.

"We must remain vigilant in defending those freedoms that we value, the democracy that we value and cherish, and remember the terror of the Holocaust, and that we must never forget it," Van Loan said.

"We must be vigilant in defending Israel's right to exist. That is what our government has insisted on, in dealing with Hamas and Hezbollah, and that is a condition that is not negotiable and should never be negotiable."

Dershowitz said that humanitarians like himself and former Canadian justice minister and current MP Irwin Cotler, who are "deeply offended by the world's exclusive focus on the Jewish nation, treating it as the Jew among nations," are in the process of drafting an indictment against Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for incitement to genocide.

"When the president of Iran says that he will wipe Israel off the face the world, wipe Israel off the map, he doesn't mean the regime in Israel. He knows that the only way to wipe Israel off the face of the map is to wipe Israelis off the face of the earth. That is incitement to genocide," Dershowitz said.

"If the international community allows this man, this Hitler of the 21st century – who is currently without the means to bring about Hitler's result, but is in the process of trying to develop those means – if the international community rejects the evidence against this man, they will have been found guilty in the court of public opinion and we need to challenge that international community in that court," he added.

He said that everyone must vow to assure that Iran is unsuccessful in acquiring nuclear weapons, which would pose an existential threat not only to Israel, but the entire world.

"We should act preventively, not only reactively. We must persuade the reasonable, legitimate, moderate members of the Islamic faith, of which there are many in Canada and the United States, to join us in condemning Iran for its Holocaust denial and delegitimation of Israel."

Telehealth conferencing continues in the Mideast

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Not even the threat of violence in the Middle East will stop Canadian, Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian doctors and academics from sharing their medical expertise in the hope of improving health-care services for their populations.

The Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) has been involved in co-operative, cross-border continuing education programming for the past 10 years.

But a formal collaboration to launch an eHealth learning program with the Middle East began last year when the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, CISEPO, the Department of Public Health Sciences at the University of Toronto and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health at Mount Sinai Hospital signed a three-year agreement.

The agreement – supported by a $1-million donation by lawyer Peter A. Silverman – created the International Network of Knowledge through Electronic Learning to program medical rounds with CISEPO's Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian partners, including the Edith Wolfson Medical Center, Tel Aviv University, Jordan University of Science and Technology and Al Quds University.

In November, just as doctors were linking up via videoconference for international medical rounds, the Palestinian contingent at Al Quds University in the West Bank had to pull out of the telecast.

The broadcast was disrupted because of Israeli shelling in the West Bank, making it too dangerous for Palestinian doctors to safely make their way to the video link at the university in the town of Abu Dis.

The meeting went ahead as scheduled with the Canadian, Jordanian and Israeli medical professionals, and last week, the Canadian and Middle Eastern doctors linked up again for a videoconference that originated from Baycrest in Toronto.

Dr. Arnold Noyek, director of the Peter A. Silverman Centre and chair of CISEPO, said the telehealth rounds, which are delivered in real time, represent the only program in the health sector that continues to cross the Arab-Israeli divide and bring together people across cultures and faiths.

"This is a Canadian-driven program because Canadians are seen as honest brokers in the Middle East and are well-respected by Arabs and Israelis alike. What we are seeing here, through CISEPO, is this exchange of knowledge that allows the professionals to come together to develop their own professional status, to move up from students to faculty to dean. It enables them to reach into the communities and deal with patients with problems," Noyek said, giving much of the credit for the program's success to Tim Patterson, Baycrest's telehealth co-ordinator.

Arnold Noyek

"He is the mastermind behind the concept of video teleconferencing, which is a tool of the much bigger CISEPO program. The telehealth component is something called the Peter A. Silverman Global eHealth Program that unites Baycrest, Mount Sinai... the University of Toronto... and CISEPO," he said.

Dr. Morris Freedman, head of the division of neurology at Baycrest, and chair of the neurology rounds said the topics of discussion for the rounds tend to focus on psychiatric conditions that afflict aging adults such as Alzheimer's Disease, depression and Parkinson's disease.

"Often we have a patient in the room for a certain period of time. Our colleagues at these different sites have the opportunity to interact, ask the patient questions and provide educational input," Freedman said, adding that Jordan has volunteered to present the rounds on Jan. 10.

Noyek said the Global eHealth Program is just one of the many initiatives that CISEPO is responsible for. For example, CISEPO, with the support of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), has managed to influence Jordanian national health policy to make hearing loss screenings at birth more of a priority, and to date, they have screened more than 180,000 newborns in the Middle East.

"If you don't find out about a deaf child by the age of two, they never have the same educational advantages as a hearing child – they will only earn about 60 per cent in a life time [compared to] a hearing child," Noyek said.

He added that it is especially important in the Middle East because consanguineous marriages – marriages between cousins – are a common phenomenon in the Arab world, and this increases the risk that a child will be hearing impaired.

He added that the telehealth programs are succeeding in building bridges between the communities by working towards a common goal.

"We have made arrangements for Jordanian residents to do training in cardiac surgery at the university in Tel Aviv. The week before, we had Jordanian and Palestinian audiologists, welcomed by a Palestinian resident training in otolaryngology at the Wolfson Medical Centre, doing a two-week program in audiology," he said.

Freedman said the best part of these rounds is being able to serve the needs of patients thousands of kilometres away.

"It is a remarkable experience to see the physicians and other health-care workers in the Middle East participating very actively in these rounds as if they were in the room," Freedman said.

Calendar changes, not much else

The new calendar year begins in the Middle East the way all the preceding years since 1948 have ended. Israel, once again, pleads with the Palestinian people to cast aside violence. Israel, once again, undertakes "confidence building" measures to buttress the popular support of a weak, as well as equivocating, Palestinian leader. Israel, once again, determinedly searches for a way of achieving peaceful coexistence, if not actual peace, with its Palestinian neighbours.

Last month's meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas was a very visible, very public extension of Israel's bruised, offering hand to the relevancy-seeking Palestinian leader. Behind the scene though, invisible to the eye but permeating all the political senses, were the prominent presences of U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair prodding their diffident Israeli colleague.

Olmert emerged from the meeting to announce a series of unilateral initiatives by his government intended ostensibly to ease life for the Palestinians, but in truth to raise Abbas' profile in his own constituency. The initiatives included the release of funds previously frozen to prevent access to them by the Hamas-run Palestinian Authority, removal of some of the road blocks in the West Bank and the facilitation of the transfer of nearly 2,000 Kalashnikov rifles to Abbas' militia, Force 17.

As political commentator Leslie Susser writes in The CJN, "the Israeli moves complement U.S. and European efforts to strengthen Fatah. By strengthening Abbas, the Americans hope to create conditions for the establishment of a new Palestinian government that would recognize Israel and become a serious negotiating partner." Israelis have leaned on this policy before. But it has always proved chimeral, too flimsy to support the pressing weight of their aspirations.

The vast majority of Israelis earnestly seek peace with their Palestinian neighbours and have proven they're willing to take considerable risks to achieve it. But what of the Palestinian side?

As of this writing, some 70 Qassem rockets have been fired at Israel from Gaza since the "ceasefire" was brokered in late November. And Gilad Shalit, the IDF soldier kidnapped by Palestinian terrorists on June 26, remains in captivity. And yet, no consequences or apparently even stigma, attach to such blatantly cynical, exploitative, hateful anti-Israel behaviour.

Herein lies one of the many structural conundrums that beset Israel's existential struggle. By defending itself hard against its enemies, the Jewish state is accused of bolstering the extremists. Yet when Israel makes concessions to the "moderates," the extremists gleefully point to the success of their no-compromise, murderous ways.

Though the general calendar has now reached 2007, the Mideast conflict calendar has not advanced past 1947.

25 years ago in The CJN

Saudi Arabia's foreign minister said his country was willing to "accept" Israel in exchange for its return of occupied Arab lands and its recognition of Palestinian rights. The remarks were in line with a 1981 Saudi peace plan that called on Israel to dismantle all settlements in the West Bank and Gaza and accept a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital. Israel rejected the plan.

Holocaust deniers refuse to face the facts

It is very difficult for me to read about the conference in Iran of known Holocaust deniers. Their hatred against survivors goes deeper than the truth. They very simply refuse to acknowledge and face the true facts.

In a camp called Szebnie, in Poland, I personally attended the burning of some 700 bodies of children, elderly and women. They were shot in front of my eyes. We had to collect the dead bodies and place them on wooden planks, pour gasoline over them and watch them burn.

In Auschwitz, I belonged to a group whose responsibility was to collect the bodies of people who did not survive the night, load them onto a cart and bring them to the crematorium.

Anyone who refuses to believe the truth of these atrocities has no conscience, or empathy. They are very simply out and out Jew haters.

Sitting down with sonei Yisrael

The attendance of members of the Neturei Karta at the recent conference of Holocaust deniers in Iran elicits many emotions – anger, shock, sadness, bewilderment ("Neturei Karta condemned," CJN, Dec. 21). As strange as it may seem, there is a view within the broad spectrum of Jewish thought – albeit perhaps only of a small minority – that sees the State of Israel as a negative occurrence in Jewish history. We may wonder how people can embrace such a view, but upon hearing of the attendance of Jews at this conference, this cannot be our most pressing question. Holocaust denial is simply another form of anti-Semitism and, bluntly, this conference was simply a gathering of sonei Yisrael, enemies of the Jewish people. Amongst all our emotions and questions, we must wonder at the sight of Jews sitting with the enemy. Are these people so foolish that they are willing to embrace those intent on their demise? Are they so overtaken by their own rhetoric that they cannot recognize this hatred of Jews? I am not ultimately shocked by their anti-Zionist views. I am ultimately shocked because whatever the nature of this position may be, it cannot justify sitting down with sonei Yisrael.

Rewriting Torah dilutes Jewish nation

It is interesting that the column "Advice for the 21st-century rabbi" (CJN, Dec. 21) was published during the days of Chanukah, a holiday that commemorates the struggle for the survival of authentic Jewish life. As in our own times, there were Jews during those days who also wished to conform Judaism to Greek-Hellenist thought. Tragically, most of them assimilated and disappeared.

Throughout the ages, history has shown that any attempt to rewrite the Torah and Jewish law to fit and accommodate current mores has resulted in further diluting the Jewish nation.

I cannot take seriously the advice that rabbis be ordained by lay people. I highly doubt that Goldstein would give that same advice to the medical or legal professions, that they be licensed by those who are not proficient and experts in their field.

What is truly needed is a sense of humility and respect toward the traditions and heritage that has kept us alive during times of great social upheavals of all eras. The Torah expects us to reach toward the highest level attainable and not to succumb to the lowest common denominator.

Urgent action required on school funding

I strongly believe we need to address the day school affordability crisis. I have three kids at Leo Baeck Day School, and not unlike others, am working as hard as possible trying to pay fees and make ends meet. I do not wish to give up the wonderful Jewish education that my kids receive. I believe there is an urgent need for concrete public action on the fair funding issue. I feel financially penalized for wanting to give my children a Jewish education.

View of feminism is an embarrassment

Sandie Benitah's view of feminism is an embarrassment to millions of women around the world who are oppressed and abused daily ("What feminism means to me," CJN, Dec. 7). Feminism means more than just having the right to wear a sexy dress or doing without a nanny! Women's equality means an end to honour killings, female circumcision, domestic abuse, poverty, and a myriad of other injustices inflicted on women. Unfortunately, many of our daughters are spoiled and out of touch with what is happening outside of their own little privileged world.

A Jew on the jury of the Dubai film festival

By BARRY AVRICH

There is something extraordinarily intriguing about the word "Arabia." The immediate visual references are Peter O'Toole in the movie Lawrence of Arabia, on a horse; wealthy Arab sheiks crossing the desert in Mercedes limousines; and massive oil fields. Take a trip down the Persian Gulf, southeast of what is called the Arabian Peninsula, and you find yourself in the United Arab Emirates, a Middle Eastern country made up of seven monarchies that were united in 1971. Emirates, the third-richest country in the world, is bordered by Saudi Arabia and Oman. Among Emirates' cities are Abu Dhabi, Fujairah and the world's newest hot spot, Dubai.

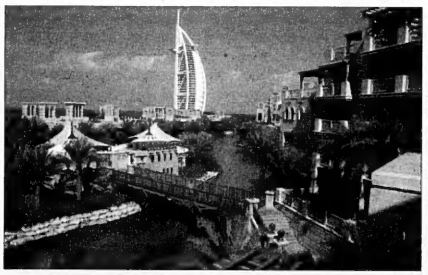
I spent 10 days in December in Dubai, on a jury screening 20 films at the third edition of the Dubai International Film Festival. Accepting the invitation to sit on this prestigious jury seemed like a great idea other than the following issues: all of the films were part of the festival's inaugural Muhr Awards for Excellence in Arab Cinema and Arabic in origin and language; my fellow jury members would be Arab film luminaries who didn't speak English, and of course, who could overlook the fact that I would be the lone Jew in town sitting on an all-Arab jury judging Arab films. Is it possible that Abdulhamid Juma, chairman of the festival, and his highness Sheik Ahmed bin Saeed Al Maktoum, ruler of all Dubai, somehow overlooked that they invited a Jew to select the year's best Arab films?

You have to understand that there is something in the DNA of the Jewish people that makes us uncomfortable toward certain cultures. For my grandparents' generation, the mere exposure to someone speaking German elicits Nazi memories and fear. Our generation becomes a little uneasy on hearing the Arab language or seeing Arabs dressed in their native robes. Our closed-mindedness prevents us from looking past the clichés created by the media and Hollywood, and we assume that anyone who looks or talks like an Arab is a suicide bomber or determined to destroy the Jewish race. Even the most literate Jews and academics are guilty of this prejudice. I counted myself as one of these people until I took the most enlightening trip of my life and returned a better human being.

The theme of the Dubai International Film Festival (DIFF) was "Bridging Cultures, Meeting Minds." I must be honest and disclose the fact that the attempt to build a bridge by flying me to Dubai first class on Emirates, perhaps the greatest airline in the world, and putting me in a suite in the ultra-swanky Madinat Jumeirah Hotel, with drivers on call and a dedicated staff, is a bridge I will cross anytime. The uneasiness I felt hearing the Arabic in-flight announcements melted away as I settled in for 15 hours of service that is simply unequalled. What other airline offers passengers a 16-inch plasma screen, a library of more than 100 classic and new-release films and relentless gourmet food and Dom Perignon? After being hustled through the extraordinarily efficient and modern 24-hour Dubai airport like a VIP, I had exactly five hours to rest before my world and perceptions were about to change forever.

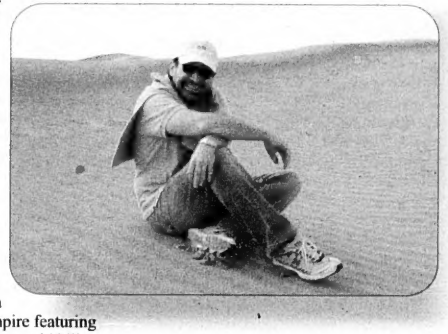
My fellow jury members were charged with selecting the best Arab documentary and short film from a pool of 20 films. They represented Iran, Lebanon, Egypt and Finland. They were very serious and were not interested in small talk or my plans for Chanukah. We screened approximately four films a day in a lavish multiplex cinema located in a shopping centre called Mall of the Emirates. This shopping centre is a first-class retail empire featuring more than 400 stores, a ski hill, a five-star hotel and a 500-seat community theatre. The mall is located in the middle of an exploding city featuring a skyline packed with hundreds of construction cranes, each competing to erect the most lavish condo or office tower. The growth in Dubai in terms of infrastructure and wealth in a short time span is simply unparalleled in world history. Back to the jury. Aside from the cultural differences between the jury and myself, I discovered the language of film is universal.

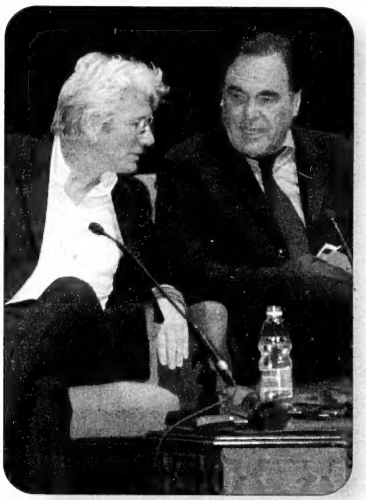
As I prepared to watch 20 films unspool, I was worried that the films might be highly political in theme, perhaps anti-Israel and militant. How could I be objective? How could I award a film that celebrates the destruction of the Jews? As I watched film after film over the next five days, I became ashamed of myself as an artist and filmmaker for even harbouring any of these senseless concerns. The films I watched were made by storytellers, not politicians. Many of the films did highlight Middle East issues and Arab-Israeli conflicts; however, the stories were always balanced and often told through the eyes of a neutral character.



The view from the author's hotel

Every film opened my eyes wider. The Arab culture, like mine, has heroes, villains, lovers and dreamers. I was not burdened with selecting propaganda-driven films. I feared that actor Vanessa Redgrave might sit next to me in the theatre ranting about Zionist hoodlums but that never happened. Instead, I was enchanted by 20 films that explored varied issues such as the first female vote in Kuwait, a mother raising a child in a Yemenite prison, a gang of homeless street girls, the slave trade of Sri Lankan maids and some wonderful and provocative short films.





The author, Barry Avrich, above sitting on Dubai sand; right, Richard Gere and Oliver Stone take part in a panel discussion.

After our daily screenings, jury members were chauffeured back to the hotel, where we had little contact with one another. What's to discuss anyway – I don't speak Arabic! Each night the festival threw lavish parties featuring gastronomic spreads and the glitterati of Dubai. The glitterati of Dubai translate to a lot of wealthy sheiks, filmmakers, many expatriates, and quite a few Canadians who work for the festival. No one can throw parties like the Dubai players, and given the intimacy of the festival, you have the opportunity to rub shoulders with guests like actors Oliver Stone, Richard Gere and Terrence Howard and hip-hopper Mos Def. Stone received a warm welcome from the Arab world and a lifetime achievement award from the festival, and Gere joined Stone on a provocative panel that debated the responsibility of filmmakers to build bridges to audiences. Legendary Egyptian filmmaker Mohammed Kahn boldly stated that it was not his responsibility to build bridges or find audiences, but to simply tell stories. Panels such as this one went a long way in contributing to the festival's growth and stature in just three years.

After we screened the films, the next phase of enlightenment began for me – a phase that would also be life changing. The jury locked themselves in a room to deliberate. Almost like out of a scene from 12 Angry Men, and with the help of body language, raw emotion and an interpreter, we began to dissect and discuss every film. The process took four complicated and emotional hours. The universal language of film again won the day as the jury discounted obvious political themes and weak ideas and voted for superior storytelling. Winners were not selected unanimously, and it took several rounds to find consensus. And we did.

The winner for best documentary and the $50,000 prize was a surprise to all: the film VHS Kahloucha, which tells the story of a Tunisian small-town filmmaker and house painter Mouncef Kahloucha, who uses his neighbours as actors, cameraman, editors and stuntmen for his original productions. The film is charming and has a Cinema Paradiso quality. VHS Kahloucha was recently selected to be screened at the 2007 Sundance Festival. The best short film prize went to Make a Wish, a sweet Palestinian film that follows a little girl's journey to buy a birthday cake. Both films celebrate humanity and the spirit of filmmaking.

The prizes were given out during a spectacular live broadcast held in the desert on a floating stage and featured hundreds of dancers, Arabian horses, laser shows and fireworks, two slick hosts and, of course, it was followed by another Dubai party. Sadly, I couldn't stay for the party. My flight was leaving at 2 a.m., and there was no chance that I would dare miss another flight on Emirates.

At a lunch held in honour of the jury at a restaurant called Pier Chic, I was lucky to get an audience with Sheik Al Maktoum. I thanked him for opening my eyes and giving me the opportunity to broaden my mind. I told him I would never look at the Arab culture the same way. He looked at me and said emphatically, "It sure beats Cannes." Gotta love Dubai.

Opinions

The greatest story on earth

It was 11 p.m. and I was in Charlotte, N.C., in my hotel room after a wedding. I turned on the TV, hoping to get a mindless rerun, but to my surprise, I got an evangelical sermon! The preacher's sermon contained four points. The first was: "There cannot be another Holocaust." He reminded his audience about Genesis 12:3, God's promise to Abraham ("In thee shall all the families of the Earth be blessed") and then explained how Christians must protect Jews, and how critical Jewish survival is to the world. Pleasantly surprised, I thought to myself: "Hallelujah!"

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

It's gratifying to see that many Christians are now dedicated to preserving our survival. (I'm sure my great-grandfather would have found this hard to believe.) But at the same time, I was saddened. How many Jews think this way about themselves? How many of us take Genesis 12:3 as an inspiration?

Some expressions of Jewish uniqueness can be arrogant and triumphalist, but for Jews to therefore ignore their own story is foolish.

Even a casual observer can't overlook the epic history of the Jews. As Winston Churchill put it: "Some people like the Jews, and some do not. But no thoughtful man can deny the fact that they are, beyond any question, the most formidable and the most remarkable race which has appeared in the world." Many non-Jews, such as Churchill and the preacher, recognize that, simply put, the Jews have the most remarkable story in history.

Yet, too many Jews ignore their own story. Leon Weiseltier calls them "slacker Jews," people who are content with a trivial "lox and bagels Judaism" and are too lazy to learn about their own heritage. The little they do know is negative and relates to the Holocaust and other catastrophes. It's a shame that too many Jews have no idea what Genesis 12:3 is about, or why a Christian preacher on late-night TV is talking about Jewish destiny.

It's time to stop being "slacker Jews." If we want to be part of the greatest story on earth, we need to know something about it. We must go beyond the tragic and the trivial.

The Talmud tells of Rabbi Hanina Ben Teradyon's martyrdom. Rabbi Hanina was wrapped in a Torah scroll, and together they were burned at the stake. As he was dying, he told his students that he saw the Torah's parchment burning and its letters flying in the air.

Rabbi Hanina taught an important lesson: beyond destruction, there is inspiration. Despite the burning parchment, the letters live on, ready to inspire another generation.

The flying letters are the key to a Jewish future, which can't be about ashes alone. We need to catch those letters, and tell the greatest story on earth.

Debunking the real Big Lie

At Tehran's recent Holocaust deception convention, a rogue's gallery of falsifiers peddled lies both big and small. The con men who deny the existence of one of recent history's most documented events received the most attention. Other participants included a former Ku Klux Klan leader whose many plastic surgeries have made him the Michael Jackson of the racist world, and a Canadian academic who, when chided, claimed he had no idea Holocaust deniers would be attending the Holocaust denial conference. Hmmm. Last time I checked, professors were in the business of fighting ignorance, not pleading and spreading it.

Gil Troy in Montreal

In this den of deceit, the most dangerous lie was not that the Holocaust did not happen. The Nazi campaign of mass murder against Jews is so well-documented that anyone who embraces this falsehood implicitly resigns from the community of civilized truth-seekers. Far more insidious is the Big Lie that motivates Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad – the fiction that Israel was only created out of European Holocaust guilt. This claim has become a central tenet among those who seek to delegimitize Israel and Zionism, the movement of Jewish nationalism. It's harder to disprove, because it's a question of interpretation, not fact. Assessing the impact of the Nazi horror on Israel's founding is more complex than the simple question of did the Nazis murder the Jews – and it's the kind of issue that historians usually enjoy debating.

Moreover, let's be honest. If you open up most world history books and turn to the 1940s, the two Jewish-related events mentioned are Hitler's destruction of European Jewry, which ended in 1945, and Israel's founding in 1948. Even people without a political agenda link the two. Many of us have long criticized various Zionist and Israeli narratives that emphasize "Meshoah le'tkuma," "from Holocaust to the founding," for creating a too-simplistic linkage and a false happy ending to the Holocaust horror.

The intermediary event linking the Holocaust to Israel's establishment is the United Nations 1947 Partition Plan, which further subdivided the part of Palestine left for a Jewish state by the British partition in the 1920s. Clearly, the Nazi crime against the Jews haunted the world's representatives as they debated the plan. However, the 1947 resolution did not mention the Holocaust. The UN resolution instead referred to "the present situation in Palestine" as "one which is likely to impair the general welfare and friendly relations among nations."

The UN was responding to the growing clash between Jews and Arabs. To begin the story of that tension with the Holocaust is similar to starting the story of American and British relations with the Boston Tea Party and ignoring hundreds of preceding years of British settlement in North America.

The Holocaust did not give birth to Zionism or the State of Israel. The Zionist idea – of the Jewish people as a nation, not just a religion, and of Eretz Yisrael being that Jewish people's homeland – is as old as Judaism itself. You can't tell the story of the Jewish people without telling the story of the Land of Israel. Even when Jews were exiled, the idea of exile meant that they defined themselves in relation to the land. And even during the long years of exile, some Jewish settlement remained in Israel.

The modern story of Zionism begins in the 1800s. New waves of settlement reinvigorated Jewish life in Israel. Prior to the 1940s, Jews developed an ideology, an infrastructure, and a life in Israel. Prior to the 1940s, various international declarations, most notably the Balfour Declaration, acknowledged the Jewish people's rights to establish a modern state in the Jews' traditional homeland. These historical factors predated the Holocaust. To deny them is as absurd as denying the Holocaust itself.

It would have been immoral to bring Holocaust refugees to Israel if an incipient Jewish state had not already been in the making there. It would have been impossible to integrate the survivors if an infrastructure did not already exist. This history – our history – is under assault. If we don't learn it, write about it, and proclaim its truth loudly, then shame on us.

The liars are speaking loudly and garnering lots of media attention. We must mobilize to stand up for ourselves, our rights and our ancestors.

What do professors do?

For much of his life – and for all of the time I knew him – my father taught mathematics and social studies in an inner city high school in New York. Although occasionally he was placed in schools in more affluent districts, his heart was always in teaching students challenged by poverty, recent immigration, spotty preparation and uncertain futures.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Most of my friends couldn't imagine what teachers did after school hours. When I was very young, my friends were shocked to see teachers shopping for groceries in the supermarket or for clothing in department stores, or indeed having any sort of life beyond the school building. Later, they believed teachers led a life of leisure, freed from daily work at a far earlier hour than their parents, who were in business or other professions.

I knew better. After hours, I saw my father planning, grading, thinking and devising creative ways to engage his students. He wrote plays about loving math, set major historical events into dramas punctuated by songs whose lyrics were set to the tunes of Broadway musicals that his students loved.

Observing him, I could see that teaching was hard work, and a labour of love. I grew up with vast admiration for my father's dedication, and also with a certainty that held for all of my adolescence that I would never be a teacher.

But life is ironic, and here I am all these years later planted firmly on a university campus as a professor of Jewish studies. What do professors of Jewish studies do? We teach, of course. It's in our capacity as university-level educators that our students encounter us and that most people come to know of us.

And, as is the case for our colleagues in other fields, the time we spend in the classroom is only part of our job. Professors also produce the knowledge we teach. Part of our job is to actively engage in research and thinking in order to advance the knowledge in our respective fields.

For the past three years, it's been my privilege and responsibility to organize and chair the annual conference of the Association for Jewish Studies (AJS). The AJS is the international professional society that represents professors of Jewish studies in all fields. Its members convene annually, as roughly 1,000 professors share the fruits of our research with our peers and keep current with the latest thinking in a range of areas that comprise Jewish studies.

The conference presenters write the books we learn from: about the Holocaust, about Jewish history, Talmud, Bible and rabbinic commentators, Jewish thought, and Jewish literature, art, and culture. A European newspaper recently referred to the conference as a "pilgrimage" site for Jewish studies professors. Chairing the AJS conference has given me an overview of work in a range of fields and disciplines, and a delicious foretaste of books to come.

During a three-day period, at any given moment, one can choose from up to 15 concurrent sessions. A sampling: Orthodoxy and the Internet, Jewish mothers and daughters, aspects of women in rabbinic literature, the memory of the Holocaust, the Dead Sea scrolls, evolution of the shul, Israeli politics, contemporary Jewish society, defining the cultural boundaries of Jewishness, Holocaust denial on the right and the left, Jews and multiculturalism, to mention a few.

Canadian participation in the conference is at the highest level, with professors from Canadian universities and professors based in other countries who were born and raised in Canada taking part. As incoming president of the AJS, I am the second Canadian in sequence to serve in that capacity. The outgoing president, Judith Baskin, was born and raised in Hamilton, Ont. Other Canadians sit on the AJS board of directors and its executive committee. Professors from my own Centre for Jewish Studies at York University join colleagues from all over the country. Canada contributes to the vibrancy of Jewish studies well in excess of its population. So it seems fitting that next year's AJS conference will be in Toronto – the organization's first foray into Canada.

My father didn't live long enough to see me follow his inspiration. But when I teach in the classroom, when I write and when I hear the work of my colleagues, I feel his presence, and the ways in which his memory is a blessing.

The Kirshner File

Sharon is the subject of new biography

Ariel Sharon, felled by a massive stroke a year ago this month, lies comatose in a Tel Aviv hospital, his chances of regaining consciousness virtually nil, his job as Israel's prime minister having been taken over by his deputy, Ehud Olmert.

Since distance creates a better sense of perspective, now is as good a time as any to re-evaluate his tumultuous career. And this is precisely what Nir Hefez and Gadi Bloom do in their exemplary biography, Ariel Sharon: A Life (Random House).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Their book, weighing in at almost 500 pages, is judicious and balanced, a bracing blend of narrative and analysis that leaves a reader fulfilled. If you read only this account of Sharon's legacy, you will need to read no more. Such is its comprehensiveness.

The authors claim that three major episodes will determine his place in the pantheon of Israeli politics: the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, which he planned as defence minister; the settling of the post-1967 territories, which he ardently championed, and the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and four settlements in the West Bank, which he rammed through like a bulldozer. Personally, I would add a fourth event: the crossing of the Suez Canal in the Yom Kippur War, which changed the tide of that seesaw conflict.

What possessed Sharon? Courage, for one thing. He was not afraid to roll the dice, come what may, and he did not care what people thought of him. He was resilient, never allowing himself to succumb to despair, even after he was removed from his post as defence minister in the wake of the Phalange massacre at the Sabra and Shatila Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon. He was able and willing to think outside the box, but that ability caused him to be insubordinate to superiors. He was flexible, not being tied down by dogma. He was for and against a Palestinian state, a security barrier and the forced evacuation of Jewish settlers from Gaza and the West Bank. He loved power and was not necessarily honest, facing criminal investigations in three scandals that nearly tarred him but incriminated one of his sons. But at the end of the day, his guiding mantra was security for Israelis. This was a principle he hewed to as a soldier and a politician.

Born in 1928 in the first co-operative farm established by the Jewish National Fund, he was the son of Samuel and Vera Scheinerman, who arrived in Palestine in 1922. He was an agronomist and she was a medical student who cut short her studies to marry Samuel. They lived a spartan life in Kfar Malal, whose land had been purchased from Bedouins. From his parents, Sharon imbibed the virtues of independence, initiative, inventiveness and determination, qualities he would draw on as an adult.

Sharon, after joining the Haganah, was a tough and aggressive soldier. At 21, he was a platoon commander in the 1948 war. During the pivotal Battle of Latrun, he was hit in the stomach and almost bled to death. As chief intelligence officer of the Central Command, he was known for his unwavering attention to detail. When the army set up Unit 101, a special commando force to fight Arab terrorism, Sharon was appointed its commander. On Oct. 12, 1953, he led a raid into the Jordanian town of Qibya. The incursion resulted in the deaths of 69 civilians and greatly embarrassed the Israeli government.

During the Six Day War, Sharon distinguished himself at Abu Ageilla. It would be regarded as one of the most complex and brilliant battles won by the Israeli army. During the subsequent War of Attrition, fought mainly along the length of the Suez Canal, Sharon challenged the chief of staff, Haim Bar-Lev. He argued that Israel could better hold the Sinai Peninsula with mobile rather than entrenched forces holed up in easily attacked bunkers and fortresses.

In the 1970s, after obliterating terrorism in Gaza, Sharon entered politics as a founding member of the Likud. But within a few weeks of Likud's formation, the Yom Kippur War broke out and he was back in uniform. Sharon exhibited brilliance in orchestrating the crossing of the Suez Canal, but he incurred the wrath of his superior, Gen. Shmuel Gonen, by launching the assault before the appointed hour. On Jan. 20, 1974, Sharon left the army for good after being passed over for promotion as chief of staff. His rival, Motta Gur, got the nod instead.

He returned to his farm, later describing that period as the happiest of his life, but in 1975, the then-prime minister, Rabin, appointed him as his security adviser. Two years later, Sharon founded the right-of-centre Shlomtzion party, but then merged it with Menachem Begin's Herut faction of the Likud party. When Begin's government was sworn in, Sharon found himself in the cabinet as minister of agriculture. He used his position to build settlements and consolidate Israel's grip on the West Bank and Gaza and in eastern Jerusalem.

Hefez and Bloom agree with the conventional wisdom that Sharon, in prosecuting the war in Lebanon, hoodwinked Begin by expanding the war and by deliberately engaging the Syrians.

Rising from the ashes after his disgraceful dismissal from the cabinet, Sharon was named minister of housing and infrastructure in Yitzhak Shamir's government. In this capacity, he built thousands of housing units in the West Bank and set back the chances for peace.

In keeping with his hard-line views, Sharon opposed the 1993 Oslo accords, refusing to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization and designating Jordan as the Palestinian state. As a minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's government, he voted against the 1997 Hebron agreement, yet, as foreign minister, he supported the 1998 Wye accord, which obliged Israel to make a further 13 per cent withdrawal from the West Bank.

Chosen leader of the Likud after Netanyahu's resignation, Sharon continued to believe that a long-term non-belligerency agreement was Israel's best hope of coming to terms with the nationalist demands of the Palestinians. But Sharon despised Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, and treated him as a pariah after his election as Israel's prime minister in 2001.

When the second Palestinian uprising worsened, Sharon isolated and marginalized Arafat and ramped up the war against Palestinian militias held responsible for the wave of terrorism. Palestinian documents found by the Israeli army in Operation Defensive Shield, launched in the spring of 2002, enabled Sharon to convince the Bush administration that Arafat was not a real partner in implementing the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which today lies dormant.

Hefez and Bloom devote considerable space, as they should, to Sharon's promotion of the Gaza disengagement plan. But they are not really sure why he embraced it. Sharon may have concluded that a unilateral initiative was required in light of his belief that a Palestinian partner did not exist. Alternatively, he may have reached the conclusion that, demographically speaking, time was not on Israel's side. Perhaps, as they also suggest, he sought to change his image from warmonger to peacemaker.

Ariel Sharon

Whatever the case, the concept of unilateral withdrawal, one of Sharon's greatest claims to fame, has been eclipsed by the recent war in Lebanon and by the continual shelling of Israeli settlements by Palestinian militants based in Gaza.

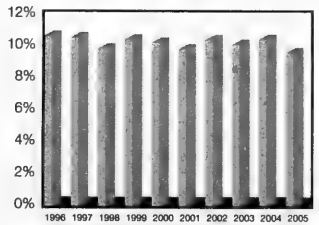
Can you say that about your RRSP?



Romspen Commercial Mortgage Performance
(July 1, 1995 – June 30, 2005)

If you're like most people, you'd be happy with an average annual return of 8% in your RRSP. Yet with low GIC returns combined with stock market volatility, few achieve this goal.

Now look at the chart. With almost boring regularity, Romspen investors have averaged an annual return of 10.2%. Isn't there room in your RRSP for this type of consistent and healthy return?

Contributions to the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund are RRSP and RRIF eligible. Likewise, this investment can also be held outside an RRSP or RRIF. Interest is paid monthly.

Happy New Year?

By RABBI JENNIFER GORMAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Another new year has begun, or has it?

People the world over make a big fuss over Dec. 31, and subsequently Jan. 1. It ends the secular year. It marks the beginning of a new tax year. But does it really signify a new beginning?

For me, New Year's Eve no longer feels like a new year. It's the middle of the school year. Yes, we've had a break, but as of Jan. 2, our lives continue as before. It's the middle of the winter. There is neither new life nor fresh harvests. In Israel, and many other countries, Dec. 31 is not even called New Year's Eve. It's the holiday of Sylvester, named for St. Sylvester, who converted emperor Constantine to Christianity and was pope during the first century. Dec. 31 is his feast day in the Catholic calendar.

The New Year is a fluid concept in Judaism. Mishnah Rosh Hashanah 1:1 teaches: "There are four New Years. On the first of Nissan is the New Year of kings and of holidays. The first of Elul is the New Year for the animal tithe. Rabbi Elazar and Rabbi Shimon say [it is] on the first of Tishrei. The first of Tishrei is the New Year for years, shmittah and the jubilee year, for planting, and for vegetables. The first of Shvat is the New Year of the tree according to the House of Shammai. The House of Hillel says on the 15th [of Shvat]."

Any of these dates makes more sense as a time to celebrate new beginnings than December or January. In Shvat, new growth begins to appear on the trees in Israel. Even here, leaf buds are beginning to form, serving as inspiration, and as a promise of warm weather to come, to all who are willing to look closely.

Nisan marks the beginning of spring. It also marks the quintessential moment in the formation of the Jewish people, our redemption from Egypt. New growth, both vegetable and animal appears all around.

As for Elul and Tishrei, for so many people, the year is starting up at that time. Families are preparing for new school years. Businesses are picking up after the summer holidays. As Jews, we know that our New Year celebration is almost upon us. It's also a time of conception. Many seeds need to gestate over the winter before blooming in spring. It's the perfect time for planting new bulbs or transplanting backyard plants. So many of the maple seeds and acorns buried by squirrels will germinate next spring. As autumn passes into winter, deep within its stark beauty, the earth lies heavy with the promise of new life for the future.

Even with all of this, we all too often focus on the secular year.

How many times have you asked the question, "Are the holidays late or early this year?" The holidays can never be late or early. Rosh Hashanah is always the first of Tishrei. Chanukah never arrives before the 25th of Kislev. Pesach will begin precisely on the 15th of Nissan. There is no changing these dates. They are locked into our lives, our calendar, and the seasons of the year. Labour Day may come late. The weather may have already begun to cool, and the leaves may have begun to turn. Perhaps it will snow on Thanksgiving. But the Jewish year will continue to mark time according to the seasons. It won't matter if daffodils have bloomed, or if snow blankets the ground.

I spent Dec. 31 at home watching videos with the kids, but I look forward to celebrating the next new year on the Jewish calendar.

Rabbi Gorman is program co-ordinator for the Beth Tzedec Institute for Jewish Family Living at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Be a mensch

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

Over the next few weeks, the Torah describes the fate of the ancient Israelites as they enter Egypt and the reality of slavery. Early on in the narrative, we are introduced to a family within the tribe of Levi, and we read about the birth of Moses. Most people are familiar with this narrative. In order to protect Moses from death in the Nile, Yocheved, his mother, builds a tiny ark and sets him among the reeds. Miriam, his sister, watches over him while the daughter of Pharaoh finds him and adopts him.

Miriam suggests bringing a Jewish woman to nurse the infant and proceeds to bring Yocheved, his natural mother, as a nursemaid. When the baby is weaned, he is returned to Pharaoh's daughter, who then proceeds to name him Moses. In this way, Moses' natural mother becomes his foster nursing mother, and his adopted mother becomes his "natural" mother who names him.

Moses' father figure is also replaced several times. Moses' natural father is supplanted by Pharaoh, who is later supplanted by Jethro, Moses' father-in-law. In fact, attempting to map out Moses' family tree would immediately show the confusing twists and turns prevalent within the text. What results is identity confusion.

Moses is born an Israelite slave, then raised as an Egyptian prince who later affiliates with a Midianite priest.

It is only while on a mountain facing the burning bush that Moses fully understands who he is. When God explains to Moses that he is meeting his ancestral God, and proceeds to name those ancestors, Moses fully realizes his own identity. One might say that upon being introduced to God, Moses is introduced to himself. But the question remains: why would the text present such a confusing background for Moses? It almost appears as if Moses' early identity is erased by conflicting parental figures.

The answer might be found in the one instance of Moses' life in Egypt that the text describes in detail. One day, after Moses is grown, he ventures outside the palace and sees an Egyptian beating an Israelite slave. We are not yet sure whether Moses is aware of his Israelite identity, yet we are told that he looked around and "upon seeing there was no person there," he attacked and killed the Egyptian.

If the text has succeeded in erasing Moses' identity, the issue becomes clear. Moses is not reacting to the situation from a sense of nationality, since his nationality is blurred. Once we are severed from the external ties of identity that define us, what is left is our essence. Moses is processing the situation from the core of his personality. Yet, if his core told him to defend the helpless, why did he look around to see that no one was there?

The rabbis of the Mishnah teach us: "in a place where there is no person, be a person." This is not referring to a place physically devoid of people, rather a place where people are so caught up in who they are and how they appear that they neglect to respond to situations as human beings. Moses realized that "there was no one there," no one who was going to respond to this injustice and step up to the plate. He looked to and fro to gain a cultural perspective, and he saw that the native Egyptian culture was apathetic to human suffering. In a place where there was no person, he stepped forward to be a human being.

We, as Jews, have a proud history of responding to human suffering around us. The Torah teaches us to use our slavery experience to empathize with the pain of others. Today, Jewish communities respond to human rights violations around the world, and we follow in the footsteps of our greatest prophet, Moses, who showed us that at the core of every Jewish person should lie a sense of menschlichkeit that should be trusted.

Rewriting the Bible, Part I

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

With over 70 volumes and sales in the millions, the Anchor Bible Project (ABP) is one of the greatest publishing ventures in history. Its aim is to translate every book of the Bible using the latest scholarly advances and archeological discoveries and to enlist the top scholars in the world, regardless of religious affiliation.

The project was started 50 years ago by the legendary biblical scholar W.F. Albright and his protégé, David Noel Freedman. The ABP is also the story of Freedman, whose father was a renowned writer on Broadway and Hollywood. Although born a Jew, the elder Freedman converted to Christianity, and his son wound up becoming a Presbyterian minister, obtaining his ordination at Princeton Theological Seminary.

Despite that, the younger Freedman felt an affinity with his Jewish roots and planned to devote his life to a study of the Jewish Bible. He quickly found out that he was not meant to be a minister in a rural parish. Being a scholarly prodigy, he was taken on by Albright as a doctoral student at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore.

Albright and his protégés were promarily responsible for the trend in the middle years of the last century to proving the veracity of the Bible by means of archeology. They had a major impact on biblical scholarship in North America and in Israel. Freedman was a leading figure among Albright's disciples.

I first got to know Freedman 30 years ago when I was working on a show for the CBC radio program IDEAS, which dealt with the spectacular discoveries of cuneiform tablets at the Syrian site of Ebla, dating to the latter part of the third millennium BCE. It was claimed that these tablets had a direct bearing on the Bible, especially the book of Genesis, and that they contained the name of Abraham's ancestor, Eber, as well as the Five Cities of the Plain, commencing with the infamous Sodom and Gomorrah, in exactly the same order as they were mentioned in the Book of Genesis.

In the first book of the ABP on Genesis, written by the eminent Jewish scholar Ephraim Avigdor Speiser, and published in the early 1960s, the argument was made that the Genesis stories reflect a milieu in the middle of the second millennium BCE.

By the mid-1970s this view, and that of the Albright School in general, had come under increasing attack by a number of scholars. Therefore, it should come as no surprise that Freedman was the one who first brought these discoveries to the attention of the North American public, thanks to one of his authors, Mitchell Dahood, a Jesuit and a professor at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome. It was in Rome that Dahood came across the work of Paolo Matthiae, the excavator of Ebla, and his epigrapher, Giovanni Pettinato.

If the Ebla discoveries were indeed dated to the third millennium BCE and their claim was true, then it would vindicate the view of the Albright School and its adherents. Unfortunately for Freedman, subsequent research could not substantiate the initial claims made for the Ebla tablets and their biblical connection. Furthermore, Matthiae and Pettinato had a falling out and the new epigrapher, Alfonso Archi, would not substantiate any biblical claims for the documents. Freedman had suffered a blow to his reputation. Yet both he and the ABP were far from finished with their amazing story and by now Freedman held the prestigious Chair in Biblical Studies at the University of Michigan. (In my next article, we will examine the pivotal role Freedman had in the ongoing saga of the Dead Sea Scrolls.)

Alex Gropper has taught at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto since 1972 and is president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto.

Tzedakah on the Net – Part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So how deep are your pockets?

Jewish tradition has spelled out how much tzedakah is enough. Just-Tzedakah.org suggests that although the absolute minimum is a paltry $2, a more realistic minimum is 10 per cent of your annual income. Interestingly, the site points out that the rabbis established an upper limit, too: 20 per cent. They were afraid if people became too generous, they might eventually come to need tzedakah themselves. [http://tinyurl.com/wfve8]

I couldn't find information about Jewish donors' giving habits, but statistics about the general population are available. In 2005, Canadians donated a record high $7.9 billion dollars to registered charities, up about a $1 billion from the previous year. The amount is impressive, but works out to a median donation of $240, far less than 10 per cent of the donors' annual income. Nationally, only 25 per cent of all tax filers claimed charitable donations. [http://tinyurl.com/ycam47]

For more on who gives – and who doesn't – in Canada, download the booklet, Canada Survey of Giving, Volunteering and Participating. For example, you'll find out that the "19 per cent of Canadians who attended religious services weekly gave 74 per cent of the total value of all donations to religious organizations." [www.nonprofitscan.ca/ page.asp?nsgvp]

The Jewish Virtual Library section has an interesting tzedakah section that includes a listing of American Jewish contributions to Israel from 1948-2004. Over those years, American Jews donated over $12 billion to Israel, but the percentage sent overseas has varied widely. For example, in 1948, 73 per cent of money raised went to Israel compared to 23 per cent in 2004. [http://tinyurl.com/y7kpg3]

Once you have calculated how much to give, you'll need to decide where to give. But not all charities are equal – at least according to Jewish law. For example, the highest priority is given to redeeming the captives (pidyon shevuyim), which "refers to paying a ransom amount (or perhaps a bribe) when someone is kidnapped or wrongly imprisoned." David Carasso has gone through some classical Jewish sources and has created a graphical summary of highest to lowest priorities. [http://tinyurl.com/y8lypg]

Although I've never had the pleasure of being targeted by them, the Jewish Funders Network is "an international organization of family foundations, public philanthropies and individual funders dedicated to advancing the quality and growth of philanthropy rooted in Jewish values." Even if you don't have your own family foundation, check out the JFN's Knowledge Center and its dozens of thought-provoking articles about tzedakah and philanthropy. [www.jfunders.org]

And here's an intriguing problem that could befall a charity. In When Good Money Comes from Bad People, three professionals look at Jewish sources to help grapple with the ethics of accepting donations from morally questionable sources. What would you do? [http://tinyurl.com/yb3lum]

MyJewishLearning presents a multi-level tzedakah section that includes a primer, a look at tzedakah themes and history, an examination of tzedakah in the Bible, Jewish tradition and a deeper look at such as issues as what Judaism says about greed. [http://tinyurl.com/yy4nsf] When done, check out the site's multiple choice Tzedakah Quiz. [http://tinyurl.com/yhx98l]

Do you mean to give regularly but forget to do so? Use the site's "Giving on Schedule" feature to send yourself regular e-mail reminders to donate to any of the 70 Jewish charities listed. As the site points out, Just Tzedakah itself is a charity and up to four per cent of your donation will be used to cover its processing costs. (Donations can be made through the site or you can use this feature simply as a reminder service.) [www.just-tzedakah.org/]

Speaking of a reminder, the NCSY's "Torah on One Foot Series" has created an attractive sheet that you can stick onto your fridge. It includes basic rules, Maimonides' Eight Levels of Tzedakah and related thoughts from the Torah and Talmud. [http://tinyurl.com/y2g5oo]

Toy inventor branches out with camera accessory

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

In 1989, a young Jewish man from Toronto made a trip to New York City with an idea of marketing a faxable greeting card.

On his first day in town, he walked into a building on Fifth Avenue that was a hub of the greeting card industry and knocked on many doors until he found a company that liked his idea and agreed to use it.

"I then knocked on doors of the press. I went to the Associated Press and Reuters and… they wrote about it," said Wayne Fromm. "I actually had a story written about me that went worldwide about how I had created the world's first faxable greeting card, and that my mother was the first one to receive one on Mother's Day."

It sounds like a fairy tale, but it's really how Fromm made a name for himself in the commercial and creative world of invention.

Some 17 years and 50 consumer products later, Fromm is now sitting back and watching the Quik Pod – a pole that attaches to a camera or video camera so that you can take pictures of yourself – fly off the shelves.

Wayne Fromm with his Quik Pod

"[The Quik Pod has] got multi-purposes. Let's say you're at a parade or a concert, you can shoot overhead by extending [your camera] in the air above peoples' heads. You can use it for self-portraiture or for an extended arm," said Fromm.

"You're able to star in your own videos and photographs for the first time without having to ask strangers for assistance."

Fromm boasts of the Quik Pod being lightweight and "not weighing more than a pair of sunglasses [and coming] with a case the size of a case for a pair of sunglasses."

After four years of back-and-forth trips from Toronto to Hong Kong, the finished product has created a stir all over the world, not just in Canada.

"Blacks and Henry's carries it here in Canada, and we've just had a re-order because they've sold out," he said.

"They are selling them all over the world. We've received orders for more than we have in the marketplace. We're getting re-orders from South Korea, from the Philippines, the United Kingdom and Australia."

Fromm came up with the idea for the Quik Pod while eating at a restaurant with his daughter, Sage, now 18.

"The table [we were sitting at] was shaky. I was trying to take a picture of the two of us… So I had to put the camera in front of us and I had to put some sugar packets underneath in order to level the camera, but you're still looking down, so your face is a little distorted."

Months later, on a vacation to Florence, Italy, Fromm became sure that his idea would be a hit.

"We were on the bridge there at the Ponte Vecchio. It was very busy, so even if you asked a stranger to take a picture, there were hundreds of people walking between you and the camera," he said.

"Now, with the Quik Pod, people go around you because they can't walk between you and the camera [that you are holding with the Quik Pod]. You can be anywhere in the world and take your own picture."

Fromm also invented Disney's Beauty and the Beast Magic Talking Mirror in 1991. When a child touched a button on the now discontinued hand-held talking mirror, characters from the movie Beauty and the Beast appeared in the mirror and spoke.

Fromm credits the mirror for bringing him into the world of entertainment.

"I read the script and worked with Angela Lansbury, who was the voice of Mrs. Potts, and Jerry Orbach, who was Lumiere. It was just fun to work with all of the characters and get that product out there," he said.

Other products invented by Fromm include the Nesquik Magic Milkshake Maker, the Crayola Sketch-A-Lot and the Crayola Doodle Mover.

While making his name as an inventor, Fromm was also running his wildly successful arcade centres, Video Invasion, the last of which closed in 2002.

"Video Invasion was really the place to go," said Fromm of the business, which opened in 1980. "Video gaming went home… and onto the Internet, so the game centres per se transformed into Internet cafes, but it's not as mainstream as it was in the 80s and 90s," he said.

In 2000, Fromm masterminded the now defunct pop act, B2Krazy, which was put together to help sell a toy called Crazy Bones, which he co-marketed.

"Crazy Bones was the only product that I marketed in my life that I did not invent, but I had a lot of fun with it, and I'm very proud of what we did with Crazy Bones," he said.

B2Krazy was a four-piece top-40 pop act who became famous for such singles as Dream About You, which was featured in the popular TV series Degrassi: The Next Generation and Something To Say.

"I lost control over [the band] because I was just involved in other things at the time, and it kind of petered out, but we had a couple of songs on pretty high rotations," he said. "We had music videos and it really whetted my appetite for the whole [music] industry."

In 2008, Fromm will release what he hopes will be his his next hit product geared toward children: Komikai are comic books the size of postage stamps that have to be read with a magnifying glass. They come with their own little plastic cases of the same size.

"Kids will put these little comic books in the cases and throw them against the wall and try to collect them and trade them, like trading cards," he said.

Canadian songwriters Dan Hill (who wrote the smash hit Sometimes When We Touch in 1978) and up-and-coming talent Brett Kruger have already written a theme song for the product.

Schechter schools may revise admissions policy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Conservative movement's 76 Solomon Schechter day schools are considering a more flexible admissions policy for children who aren't Jewish according to Jewish law.

Currently, such children – who mostly have Jewish fathers and non-Jewish mothers – are admitted provided the students agree to convert within one year. But at the national convention of the Solomon Schechter Day School Association, which took place last month in Boca Raton, Fla., delegates considered a draft that would extend that time limit.

A draft proposal would remove the one-year deadline, but the child would still be expected to convert before bar or bat mitzvah age. Time frames would be set by individual schools.

Rabbi Shimshon Hamerman, principal of the Solomon Schechter Academy in Montreal, told The CJN in a phone interview that the school's official policy is to admit students who are "Jews according to Conservative [halachic] standards."

However, in actual practice, the school, which has almost 800 students from pre-kindergarten (junior kindergarten) to Grade 6, will admit non-halachically Jewish students "as long as the family is engaged in a program where they will become Jewish."

If a non-halachically Jewish child "appears to be genuinely interested," he added, "our task is to bring them close to Judaism rather than turn them away."

The incidence of such requests has increased, he said, but "we're still talking about one or two a year, not dozens and dozens."

Lucy Cohen, head of school at United Synagogue Day School in Toronto – the only other day school in Canada affiliated with the Conservative movement – did not return phone messages, but in an e-mail statement, she said the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism "is going through a lot of delineations in the wake of recent decisions, and the impact on Solomon Schechter schools has not yet been discussed."

The Schechter school association's board of directors will discuss feedback on the issue from convention delegates, said Elaine Cohen, national consultant to the Solomon Schechter schools.

Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice-president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, reaffirmed the movement's support for marriage between two Jews, and conversion of the non-Jewish spouse in the case of intermarriage.

Torontonians witness Polish cemetery reclamation

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Susie Kaplan remembers Monday Oct. 23, 2006, as one of the most bittersweet days of her life.

That day, the 58-year-old Toronto native stood at the historic rededication ceremony for the Jewish cemetery in Ivansk, Poland.

It's where her grandmother is buried, along with an unknown number of other Ivansker Jews killed by the Nazis more than 64 years ago.

"It was a very special, emotional day," she said. "When we got there we saw TV reporters, local personalities, a Polish ambassador… and the townspeople came out to walk with us as we marched towards the cemetery."

Kaplan, her sister Evy Eisenberg and 45 other Ivansk Jews' descendants from Canada, America and Israel, took part in an eight-day trip to Poland organized by retired Pennsylvania pathologist Norton Taichman, who himself is the progeny of Ivanskers.

Taichman, 70, founded the Ivansk Project in 2001 to learn more about the history of the area's Jews and eventually to raise funds to reclaim their cemetery.

The project culminated in last October's trip and ceremony.

The group visited the Warsaw monument, as well as Treblinka and Auschwitz, among other sites.

Thanks to maps procured by Taichman, Kaplan and others were also able to pinpoint where their families' dwellings used to be in Ivansk.

"It was so emotional," she said. "My sister and I just cried and cried on the spot where my father's house once stood."

Susie Kaplan , left, and sister Evy Eisenberg stand next to the Ivansk stone memorial on the Treblinka grounds.

The Ivansk shtetl, known as Iwaniska to modern-day Poles, had a prewar Jewish population that numbered in the thousands.

In the evening of Oct. 13, 1942, upon hearing that the Nazis had overrun a neighbouring town, Ivansk's Jews obtained a permit to conduct a sombre burial for their Torah scrolls to protect them from Nazi defilement.

According to witnesses, the town's rabbi proclaimed that Ivansker survivors should come back, exhume the scrolls and reclaim the town.

The next day, the Nazis swarmed Ivansk, executed dozens of Jews and forced the rest onto trains bound for Treblinka, where most perished.

Upon learning this story and visiting the town for the first time in 1996, Taichman, whose father was born in Ivansk, took up the cause.

Writing to The CJN via e-mail, Taichman stated, "For me, this forgotten, violated and abandoned graveyard became a universal symbol for what happened to our people during the course of European history," he wrote. "This desecrated ground became the driving force for me to try to pay homage to my ancestors."

Taichman set up an account with the Fundacja Ochrony Dziedzictwa Zydowskiego (FODZ), the Polish Foundation for Preservation of Jewish Heritage, and used the group as an intermediary to pay Polish contractors for work on the cemetery.

The project also relied on the expertise of the Poland Jewish Cemetery Restoration Project (PJCRP), a non-profit U.S. foundation based in Buffalo, N.Y.

While visiting Ivansk on numerous occasions since 2001, Taichman oversaw construction of a wall around the cemetery, as well as the grooming of its grounds, the erection of a monument, the placement of a memorial plaque and the recovery of numerous tombstones.

But the Torah scrolls were never found.

According to Taichman's research, the scrolls were dug up by locals and the leather used to make shoes.

As a further insult, most of the tombstones were used in the foundations of new buildings and are thus lost forever.

The cemetery itself was protected over the past decades as a heritage site by Polish law – the only reason it, too, was not converted for other uses.

Though he worked obsessively to see the project to its completion, Taichman took ill just prior to the October trip and never made it to the dedication.

Kaplan said her experiences on the trip left her both relieved and angry.

In Ivansk, she encountered an elderly man who remembered her grandfather and regaled her with stories about him.

It had a profound effect on her.

"I never called my father's father 'grandfather,' but now I can say it. Now I know he was a real person," she said.

But it was also very difficult being around the Poles, she said. "You walk around and look at them and you're suspicious of all of them."

Kaplan suggested that Jews pause to think before returning to Poland for sentimental visits.

"[Polish interest in Jewish history] is all about money and tourism," Kaplan said. "There is a strange phenomenon happening in Poland now. There is a Jewish revival, but without Jews."

Still, having experienced the rededication of the cemetery and after visiting her father's town, Kaplan managed to retain some fondness for Poland.

"There are a lot of Poles who are very sympathetic [to Jews]," she said.

And from what one of her knowledgeable guides told her, there may be a reason for that.

"He knew a lot about the history of Polish Jewry," Kaplan said. "We asked him if he was Jewish. He said, 'I'm not. But if you scratch the skin of any Pole, you'll find Jewish blood.'"

Wills and estates lawyers preach family unity

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

There are more wars coming.

They won't involve tanks or guns, or take place in distant theatres of war.

Instead, they'll be fought on a battlefield that can't be mapped, cleansed or forgotten, because these wars will be waged within your family.

Les Kotzer

According to many legal experts, some of the ugliest fights in our community today are a result of family infighting over estates and inheritances.

Jordan Atin, associate counsel with Hull & Hull LLP in Toronto, is disturbed by the growth in his industry.

"When I started here eight years ago, we were just two lawyers. Now we're at 16. The whole area is exploding," Atin said.

Imagine taking your sister or brother as a symbolic hostage or human shield.

Picture twisting your parent's last wishes into verbal ammunition to lay emotional waste to their children and grandchildren.

Think it can't happen to you? Think again, say the experts.

"I've seen [situations] where families no longer attend the same shivahs together," said Les Kotzer, a Toronto wills and inheritances lawyer.

That's why he co-authored two books on the subject, The Family Fight: Planning to Avoid It and The Family War: Winning the Inheritance Battle.

"A funny thing happens [to families] when both parents die. It's like the referee is gone," said Atin, one of Kotzer's co-authors.

And as the baby boom generation continues to deal with its collective mortality, estates and inheritance professionals are continually being thrust into inheritance battles that wills lawyers believe can be avoided.

Fred and Richard Levitt, a father-and-son estates law team with Levitt, Lightman, Dewar & Graham in Toronto, see the problem daily.

"There's more [fighting] now, because there is more money involved. As a result of that, greed takes over," Fred said.

One of the best ways to pre-empt fights is to make sure a will is in good working order.

"I've seen a lot of really ugly stuff," Richard said. "If parents can make their intentions clear before they die, and settle everything with their beneficiaries, that's best."

But inheritance wars aren't always about money. Often, sentimental items are the ones that cause the most anguish.

"Parents shouldn't assume there is goodwill among their children," Kotzer said. "Because after they are gone, how do children divide up a wedding ring, or a treasured picture?"

A classic situation is when the "favoured" child becomes executor and siblings use the scenario to vent years of resentment at them by contesting the will, Atin said.

That's why deciding on an executor is crucial.

Barry Fish, of Fish & Associates and another of Kotzer's co-authors, has worked as an executor's lawyer for 33 years.

Fish advises families to use an independent executor if none is specified in a will.

"People don't realize that executors have serious obligations and can be sued for damages if beneficiaries so choose," he said.

But if you are made an executor of a family estate, keep your cool, he advised. It could help protect you against future claims about your behaviour.

"The more unreasonable your family, the more reasonable you should be," Fish said.

Kotzer laments what he sees as the increasing deterioration of family bonds because of estate wars.

He recalled how one client recently informed him that her sisters were all now "dead to her," while another insisted on calling his brother "my mother's other child."

All this was due to greed and vitriolic attacks over inheritances.

"It's a tragedy," Kotzer said. "And it can be avoided or minimized in many cases, with the right discussion."

Richard Levitt sees the same family breakdowns.

"I just had two sisters come in. Their parents left everything to their brothers because they [had] an 'old school' mentality," Richard said. "They assumed the brothers would divvy up the inheritance, but the [sisters] were out of luck and deeply resentful."

Kotzer suggests that siblings and extended family consider where their support will come from in the future if they alienate their kin in an estate battle.

"What will happen to them in 30 years from now if they become sick?" he asked. "They won't have that loving support at their bedside."

All the more reason for families to get talking about their inheritances now.

"Families [should] be able to go to the same simchahs together [instead of] creating an enemy of their sibling," Kotzer said. "That's the horror that I'm witnessing. Don't let this happen to you."

Journalist omits facts about Israel in CBC interview

On CBC Radio's The Current (Dec. 19) host Anna Maria Tremonti interviewed Robert Fisk, the Beirut-based Middle East correspondent for Britain's The Independent newspaper, about developments in the Middle East over the past year.

Fisk, well-known for his persistent criticism of Israel, likes to argue, as in his recent book, The Great War for Civilization: The Conquest of the Middle East, that he is also critical of Arab regimes.

That is true, to a point.

But his real animus is most often directed at Israel, where he can also be highly selective and even loose with the facts.

Fisk praised former U.S. President Jimmy Carter's recent book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, which has been criticized by many Mideast experts (but not, so far, on the CBC) for its extreme one-sidedness against Israel.

Fisk's obsession with Israel showed up when he spoke about the Turkish genocide of the Armenians during World War I.

Tremonti: "Why is this [recognition of the Armenian genocide] so important now?"

Fisk: "Because if we don't acknowledge the sins of history, we will never live together. You know, the Jewish Holocaust was an immense crime against the Jews, but it was also a crime against humanity. The reason why acknowledgement of the Jewish Holocaust is important is that they were human beings like you and me, not because they were this group or that group. And that is the same for the Armenians… Remember, the whole Armenian community was driven out of Turkey…"

And Fisk used this reference to segue back to his familiar starting point – Israel.

Fisk: "Well, look, you have the same thing with the Palestinians on a much smaller scale. 750,000 Palestinians were driven out of that part of Palestine that became Israel in '48. I think we all know that they will not go back. The 'right of return' for these people, which is enshrined in General Assembly Resolution 191 [sic] which tells them that they can go back to their homes; they're not going to go back because if they did there'd be no more State of Israel. But I think there will have to be at some point in history an acknowledgement by the Israelis, 'Yes, we threw them out.' The line at the moment is that they all left of their own accord because the Arab leaders said 'Get out of your homes until we drive the Jews into the sea.'"

Tremonti: "This is a real point of contention."

Fisk: "It's not a point of contention… Israeli scholars have categorically proved themselves… that no such calls were made to the Arab population. They left because there were massacres like at Deir Yassin by various guerrilla groups…"

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

History, Fisk insists, "will have to be addressed there and done fairly."

The problem is that Fisk's account of Israeli-Palestinian history is anything but fair. It is highly selective and consistently casts Israel in a negative light as a brutal, callous aggressor.

A few essential facts that Fisk conveniently omitted:

- Tens of thousands of Palestinians did leave pre-state Israel of their own volition. They left to escape the fighting begun by their own people who violently rejected the November 1947 UN partition resolution of Palestine – a partition plan accepted by the Jews.
- The invasion of Israel by five Arab armies in May 1948 was the main factor causing hundreds of thousands of Palestinians to flee. True, in some places like Ramle and Lod, where the fighting was intense, local Israeli commanders did expel Arabs; but in others, like Haifa, Arabs were urged to stay.
- UN General Assembly Resolution 194 (not 191, as Fisk states) deals with the issue of refugees in one small paragraph. Nowhere does it mention a "right of return" nor does it "enshrine" such a right. Indeed, the word "right" never appears. The resolution states only that those wishing to return should be "permitted" to do so if they are willing to live in peace or accept compensation. But when 194 was passed in December 1948, the Arabs were engaged in a war to destroy the nascent Jewish state.
- Approximately 800,000 Jews were made refugees from Arab lands in the years immediately following Israel's creation. What of their rights?

Rachel Corrie play cancelled

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

My Name Is Rachel Corrie, the controversial play about an American activist who was killed in 2003 when she stepped in front of an Israeli bulldozer, will not be brought to Toronto stages.

Martin Bragg, the artistic producer of CanStage, told The CJN in November that after reading the script, he decided to pursue the rights to bring the play to the Toronto-based theatre company for the 2007-08 season.

The play, which is based on Corrie's e-mails, letters and journal entries, is about a 23-year-old woman from Olympia, Wash., who travelled to Rafah in the Gaza Strip as a member of the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement.

Bragg said that despite the controversial way in which Corrie died, the play is not anti-Israeli propaganda, but a portrayal of an extraordinary woman's journey.

But according to the Toronto Star, after having seen the play in New York at the off-Broadway Minetta Lane Theatre before the run ended ahead of schedule last month, Bragg said that the play "didn't seem as powerful on stage as it did on the page."

The play, which was co-edited by the Guardian's features editor Katherine Viner and co-edited and directed by British actor Alan Rickman, who played Severus Snape in the Harry Potter series, had two sold-out runs in London at the Royal Court Theatre in 2005, and one at the Minetta Lane Theatre.

The theatre acquired the rights after James Nicola, the artistic director of the New York Theatre Workshop, postponed the production, which was eventually cancelled, reportedly because of pressure from Jewish groups who felt the play was anti-Israel and anti-Semitic.

FASHION SHOW:

The Zareinu Educational Centre's fashion show wowed more than 600 women who attended the recent fundraiser for the school. Models from several Toronto day schools participated, including Zareinu students who wore fashions from the retailers Growing Pains and Higher Ground for Kids. Seen in top photo are event co-chairs, from left, Stacy Markin, Robin Shugar-Hershkop, and Renee Rosenzweig. A highlight of the show was 11-year-old Zareinu student Shayna Markin's walk down the runway, bottom photo, with her seven-year-old twin siblings, Kayla, left, and Joshua, right. More than $140,000 was raised. For information about Zareinu, a school for special needs children, contact Randy Spiegel at 416-787-8278 or randy@zareinu.org. [Mani Melnick photos]

Israeli universities face a crisis, symposium warns

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Universities in Israel face a deepening crisis, a symposium at Haifa University warned last month.

The crisis, caused by government cutbacks and a corresponding erosion of academic independence, is so serious that Israel's system of higher education may yet disintegrate, said the organizer of the conference, Ilan Gur-Ze'ev.

The symposium, which attracted about 120 participants from Israel's seven research universities, was titled "Is Higher Education in Israel Headed for Catastrophe?"

In an interview following the conference, Gur-Ze'ev, a Haifa University professor, said the crisis has demoralized many academics and prompted some to leave the country.

One of the participants, Haifa University mathematician Yair Censor, said a consensus was reached that the crisis may well affect the nation at large.

"There is deep concern for the well-being of the State of Israel if further damage to the seven research universities is caused, and if the government does not immediately allocate funds to strengthen research and education there," he said in an interview.

Participants also concluded that government efforts to convert the university governance system into "a business-like system" will irreparably erode academic independence on the institutional and personal level, Censor reported.

"This could have dire effects on future achievements of higher education in Israel," he added.

The freedom and independence Israeli universities enjoy under a 1958 law to manage their own affairs is now threatened, Censor charged.

"The government has gradually clipped the total allocation for [universities] by more than one billion shekels over the past five years, thus severely cutting funding."

Cutbacks have led to a brain drain of many talented academics, especially scientists, he noted.

Censor attributed the current situation to a nationwide strike by professors in 1994 to protest low salaries.

As a result of the 70-day work stoppage, the government "dispersed" academic labour unions and changed the structure of universities, he said.

"The coerced restructuring continues today by virtue of the attempt to abolish academic tenure and replace it by a system of personal contracts based on differentiation between institutions, departments, disciplines and individuals."

Under a "smokescreen" that touts reform, scientific excellence and managerial flexibility, the government is destroying Israel's academic system, Censor claimed.

Gur-Ze'ev said that if current trends persist, Israeli universities will become "industrialized" and "less free, creative and humanistic-oriented."

Describing the current situation as untenable, Censor urged politicians not to interfere in university affairs and called on the government to reinstate funding to acceptable levels.

Censor and Gur-Ze'ev both agreed that Diaspora Jewry has a vital role to play.

"Jews from all over the world who cherish Israel, and particularly its scientific edge, should express their total dissatisfaction with the management of our universities to directions where we will lose our brain advantage," said Censor.

In Gur-Ze'ev's view, Jews outside Israel can be "a very helpful factor" by supporting the principle of academic autonomy, even by means of financial pressure.

"Academic freedom and intellectual creativity in universities are not only the key to Israel's techno-scientific and economic future, but also the gate to its democratic future."

Canadian academic served in Knesset

Obituary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Henry (Zvi) Weinberg, a former university professor and the second Canadian after Dov Joseph to serve in the Knesset, died in Jerusalem last month after a two-year battle with blood cancer. He was 71.

Henry (Zvi) Weinberg

Born in Krakow, Poland, Weinberg lived in France, Israel and the United States before settling in Canada. A graduate of Northwestern University and the University of Michigan, he taught French literature at the University of California-Irvine prior to accepting a similar position at the University of Toronto in 1970.

A Zionist and the former deputy chair of Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East, he was a Soviet Jewry activist from the 1960s onward.

He made aliyah in 1992.

Weinberg signed on with Natan Sharansky's now defunct Russian immigrant party, Yisrael b'Aliyah at the moment of its inception in 1995.

The party, whose mandate was to help facilitate the integration of Soviet Jews into Israeli society, won seven seats in the 1996 election, and joined former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing Likud coalition government.

Weinberg, who described himself as left-of-centre on Israeli political issues, served as a backbencher and as a member of several parliamentary committees.

A one-term MK, he left politics after the 1999 election, which brought to power the Labour party's Ehud Barak.

"Politics was not his cup of tea," said his son, David, the director of the Canada-Israel Committee's office in Jerusalem, in an interview. "He was a scholar. He was not a politician."

In an interview with The CJN in 1998, Weinberg said of politics, "It's a life of hard work and stress."

During the last decade of his life, he was active in academic and intellectual circles in Jerusalem, worked to combat anti-Semitism and travelled in Europe.

"He was absolutely happy in Israel," said David. "Israel was the fulfillment of a lifetime of public activities."

His funeral was attended by some of Israel's leading political figures.

Apart from David, he is survived by his three other children, Eli, Michael and Deena, all of whom live in Israel, and by his former wife, Harriet, who also lives in Israel.

Academic faces 'rebuke' for attending Iran conference

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Controversy that continues to swirl around Shiraz Dossa will not be resolved until sometime in January, according to the president of St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, N.S., where the embattled political science professor teaches.

Dossa attended a December conference in Tehran, hosted by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has called the Holocaust a "myth" and advocated that Israel be "wiped out."

Dossa presented a paper called "Liberalism, Holocaust and War Against Muslims," claiming he had academic freedom and freedom of speech on his side when he accepted the opportunity to speak to the gathering of known Holocaust deniers.

The forum drew 67 delegates from 30 countries, including such notorious anti-Semites as David Duke, American former head of the Ku Klux Klan, and Robert Faurisson, a French academic who was convicted in France for his denials of the Holocaust.

On his return to the Antigonish campus, Dossa, who has taught at St. Francis Xavier since 1988, faced scathing rebuke from many of his fellow academics and from university president Sean Riley.

Dossa claims Tehran trip was relevant to his work

After two meetings with academic officials on campus, Dossa issued a prepared e-mail message to his colleagues claiming "as a political theorist," he found the Tehran trip relevant to his work.

"The conference was unfortunately tainted by the presence of a small number of Holocaust deniers," he wrote in a two-paragraph notice, which was picked up by local and national media, "but I feel it is a mistake to boycott any academic conference because of the presence of participants whose views one finds repugnant."

On first hearing of Dossa's involvement last week, Riley forcefully called Dossa's appearance at the conference "a brutal shock to be associated in any way to that conference or to be lending it credibility. My reaction is disbelief. This is certainly not helpful to the university's reputation academically, and it's very clear the anti-Semitic nature of much of the conference is at opposites with the values St. F.X. espouses."

"To deny the horror and the tragedy of the Holocaust is something we find abhorrent," Riley told the Halifax Chronicle Herald. "It's a very questionable conference for anyone to be attending."

However, he later softened his stance. "I have no direct knowledge of what he said or the paper that was presented," he said in a phone interview with the Toronto Star. Having not yet seen the paper, Riley said, "It's his property. Essentially, it is his decision who he shares it with and how widely it is disseminated."

A letter signed by 105 faculty members declared "profound embarrassment" over Dossa's participation.

Michael Steinitz, a physics professor at St. Francis Xavier, found Dossa's participation in the conference especially offensive. Steinitz, who's Jewish, lost his grandparents and other family in the Holocaust.

"It's very hard to accept when somebody says this all didn't happen," he told the Chronicle Herald, "It was not a conference in which there were a few Holocaust deniers and a lot of academics. It was a conference of Holocaust deniers at which, so far as I am aware, there was only one academic, and that was Shiraz Dossa."

He added Dossa is a follower of left-wing political activist Noam Chomsky, and opposed to the policies of most western governments, and especially those of the United States and Israel.

"I've known Mr. Dossa's tendencies for several years and thought them extremely unpleasant, but I never thought that he would lend his credibility to something as awful as this," Steinitz said, "By doing that, he lends a certain amount of St. F.X.'s credibility to it and that's pretty sad."

Jewish officials across Canada expressed disappointment and anger at Dossa's appearance in Tehran.

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said in a telephone interview from Toronto, he was shocked that a Canadian academic from a very reputable institution (St. Francis Xavier was number 1 on Maclean's magazine's list of undergraduate universities in 2006) would want to appear there.

Morgan, a law professor at University of Toronto, said he disagreed with this appearance. "It would be fine at a post-colonial studies conference held at a reputable university. I think he's wrong, but there is nothing wrong with doing it. But participating at President Ahmadinejad's conference sends a different message."

Morgan praised Riley's initial statement as "strong. It was powerful and we agree with it."

He stressed a professor has a right to speak as he feels, "but he also stands to be criticized, sometime heavily, for saying things that are offensive, hurtful, wrong-headed, and frankly, highly distasteful. Freedom of academic expression and speech are not a defence against mindless or hurtful content."

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, expressed concern for the type of message Dossa was presenting to his classes.

"We have no Jewish students on campus, so can't monitor him easily. But we've heard from Prof. Steinitz and some of his students [through the Chronicle Herald] that he has a history of anti-western and anti-Israeli feelings."

Goldberg said he had spoken to Riley and asked if a professor was teaching something anti-Semitic, do "we have the opportunity to bring the other side to the students?"

Allen Gates, director of communications at St. Francis Xavier, was fielding all calls on the university's behalf. He was reluctant to talk but said meetings were being held between Dossa and academic officials. He did tell the media that Dossa was not representing St. Francis Xavier at the Tehran conference. "He's there as an individual. His views or opinions are his own."

As of the end of 2006, Gates and officials at the university were remaining mostly mum about the situation but expected that a statement on Dossa's status would be forthcoming.

Montreal deli closes after 90 years

Bens' demise recalls clandestine arms meetings

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The announcement last month that Bens delicatessen was closing after more than 90 years brought to Eiran Harris' mind not fond memories of family Sunday lunches, but of sitting in on his father's clandestine dealings with potential arms suppliers.

Harris' father, David, was an arms procurer for the nascent state of Israel. Through 1946 and 1947, and much of 1948, Harris would meet his prospective clients at Bens, unbeknownst to its owners.

This was the old Bens, kitty-corner to its last location, at de Maisonneuve Boulevard and Metcalfe Street, and a much smaller place. Harris, who was a lad of 13 or 14 at the time, remembers there were maybe five tables, plus seats at the counter.

The elder Harris chose Bens not for the food, his son insists, but because "the noise was deafening. If you spoke in a normal voice, you could not be heard beyond your table."

But another reason was the large menu board over the counter.

The elder Harris and his "clients" used the items listed as code names for the goods they were haggling over. So a smoked meat sandwich, with fries and a pickle could have meant, say, an airplane engine, mortars and a radar set – at least, on a good day.

"Through this code that they concocted they were able to discuss what they had been able to find or had to offer," said Eiran Harris, an archivist at the Jewish Public Library. "There was a lot of bargaining. The Jewish nation was dirt-poor, so every cent that could be saved on a bullet was important."

Harris' suppliers included both Jews and non-Jews, his son said. "The good, scarce stuff – mostly surplus from World War II – came from non-Jews through the underground. The Jewish suppliers were mostly scrap-metal dealers or second-hand dealers, who happened to come across something. That it could be turned into a useable armament was not their concern."

The elder Harris was a wheeler-dealer from way back.

A Winnipeg native, he had emigrated to Palestine in the mid-1920s and became a member of the paramilitary Haganah. He was useful for missions abroad because of his knowledge of several languages, not only English, Hebrew and Yiddish, but also German and some French and Arabic.

"He quickly rose in the arms procurement field, and by 1946 was considered an expert," his son said. Harris, who died in 1967, also had success in trading with the Soviet Union ambulances for Jewish refugees from the Holocaust.

After the corn exchange failed in Manitoba, David Harris went to Chicago to deal in the larger commodities market, but it also soon collapsed, foreshadowing the stock market crash of 1929.

"He went broke betting on pork bellies and soybeans, so he decided to try his luck in the land of Israel," his son said.

"How did my penniless father make it to Palestine? Well, he called the FBI and told them there was an alien holed up in a certain rooming house. Then he went to that rooming house and waited for the agents to arrive.

"When they found him and asked for his papers, he blabbered in a mixture of Hebrew, Yiddish and broken English that, yes, it was true he had no visa or whatever, and they promptly deported him – at the U.S. government's expense."

Incidentally, Harris, who has been researching the history of smoked meat in Montreal, points out that Bens never had an apostrophe in its name.

The lack of punctuation had nothing to do with Quebec's language law and perhaps everything to do with the Kravitz family's foresight – the family, which owned the deli, never had to change the huge sign that has heralded the location they moved to in 1950, some 27 years before Bill 101 was passed in 1977, mandating the predominance of French on commercial signs.

פרק א: במשחק צמרת בין הפועל תל אביב ובית"ר ירושלים נזרק מיצית הפועל תל אביב רימון הלם למגרש. על המגרש נפצע מהרימון דוקא יוסי אבקסיס, כוכב הפועל.

פרק ב: אוהדי הפועל התנצלו בפני אבקסיס, כי הכוונה לא היתה אליו אלא לכוכב ירושלים שמעון, ש"בגד" ועבר מתל אביב לירושלים.....

פרק ג: יוסי אבקסיס מקבל את התנצלות האוהדים .....

פרק ד: המשטרה מזהה, לפי המספר הסידורי שעל הרימון, את הזורק-לא פחות ולא יותר- סדן בהנדסה קרבית.

אז מה היה לנו כאן? קודם כל קצין צה"ל שמביא רימון הלם למשחק כדורגל וזורק אותו כדי לפגוע באדם אחר.

שנית: אוהדים שמתנצלים, כי סך הכל התכוונו לטוב-ענו לפגוע באיש רע מירושלים-אבל פגעו באיש שלהם.

ושלישית: אבקסיס מקבל את ההתנצלות, כי הוא בטח מבין שהאוהדים התכוונו לטוב.

כשהתאושש מן השוק הזמין ברונפמן לביתו שבעים ממנהיגי הקהילה לאותו ערב. לפני אותה מסיבה הביט ברונפמן בחמלה בפרס שהגיע ישר מהקיבוץ ואמר לו: " אתה לא יכול להופיע לפני עשירי מונטריאול בגרביים כאלה....." וכך זכה פרס בתותחים וגם בגרביים. זוכרים את שירה של להקת הנח"ל "תותחים במקום גרביים"!

Winnipeg groups to help seniors in their homes

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO), Jewish Child and Family Services, and Certified Safety Checkers are coming together to improve the quality of life and the safety and security of Jewish seniors in their own homes.

"Seniors are too often isolated from the rest of society and have no people coming to visit them," said Einat Paz-Keynan of Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Services (JCFS).

"The idea for the seniors' home safety program is to better ensure that seniors feel safe in their day-to-day lives," Paz-Keynan said. "But even more, it is to give those seniors who are living independently, but alone and isolated, the kinds of services, time and care that every person should have."

On Jan. 21, JCFS and Certified Safety Checkers will be hosting a workshop for BBYO volunteers from Balmoral Hall girls school, who will learn how to communicate effectively with seniors when going out on the home-visit project.

The visits will take place one time per month in February, March, and April.

"It is good for seniors to have young, new faces coming to see them," Paz-Keynan said.

Some 30 seniors will take part in the home safety check project. Two or three volunteers, along with a BBYO advisor, will go out for each visit. They will bring an ice-breaking gift, such as a fridge magnet or cookies. The first 20 minutes will consist of routine checks, followed by filling out health information forms and casual conversation.

"What is so unique about this particular program is that these [BBYO] girls are really mixing and connecting with the clients, first-hand," Paz-Keynan said. "They go right out into the communities and meet people of different ages with a whole other life experience. So both the girls and the clients get to sit and talk and learn about one another."

The teen volunteers will help the seniors to fill out a personal health information package, which will be placed on their fridge. This way, in case of an emergency, medics will know all pertinent details of the senior's medical history.

Whistles or flashlights will also be distributed to the seniors for them to use for safety and security when going out alone.

Danial Sprintz, director of BBYO's Red River Region, said that "not only are many seniors isolated and not leaving their homes, many are also living in poverty. Seventeen per cent of Jewish families in Winnipeg cannot afford to eat on the holidays, let alone the rest of the year."

Sprintz added that the teens "are highly motivated to succeed."

Both Paz-Keynan and Sprintz said they hope the project develops into an annual event.

Julie Klein, a Grade 12 student at Balmoral Hall and president of BBYO's Gabriel chapter, noted that some of the seniors who will be visited are survivors of the Holocaust, and that she and many of the BBYO volunteers are past participants in the March of the Living. "It's important to be able make this connection between generations of Jews."

Each BBYO chapter has a community service component, and members decide what kind of projects they want to do. Klein said the Gabriel chapter really wanted to do something different and meaningful within the Jewish community.

"Rachel Solomon, who is my friend and vice-president of the chapter, suggested the idea, and we all liked it. Then, we approached JCFS, and together, we set things into motion."

The program will be "very rewarding for all involved," Klein said.

"We will be helping out in the community, trying to make a real difference in people's lives. We want to be able to put a smile onto people's faces, and make their day."

Second Schwartz brother makes hall of fame

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — In September 2005, Harold Schwartz read the introduction as his brother, Irving, was inducted into the Cape Breton Business Hall of Fame.

One year later, Harold, 75, listened as Irving read the introduction when the Sydney, N.S., retailer followed his brother into the respected hall.

"He got back at me," Harold laughed.

More than 350 people at the induction dinner heard how Harold ran Jacobson's Ladies Wear for 39 years in downtown Sydney before retiring 15 years ago, as well as how he recognized trends in lifestyles very early and expanded Jacobson's to include several stores that specialized in different aspects of women's fashion.

"I loved the pace, the challenge and the changes in ladies' wear," Harold said of his career in retailing. "Now that I'm retired, I'm into real estate and the stock market."

Harold is the fifth of six children of legendary New Waterford, N.S., retailer Rose Schwartz, whose husband died very young and left her a business to run and a family to raise. Harold quickly developed a solid work ethic, and earned a business degree from Drexel University in Philadelphia before returning home to take over Jacobson's at age 21 in 1952.

Life was not all business for Harold. He was founding president of Ben Eoin Ski Club in Cape Breton's Highlands and was commodore of Dobson Yacht Club in Sydney, where he sailed for more than 20 years.

He was also a Big Brother, president of the Cape Breton Community Concerts Association, and chaired the merchandising committee of the 1987 Canada Winter Games in Sydney.

He and wife Diane recently established an endowment fund at Cape Breton University to help needy students.

In the Jewish community, Harold was president of the local B'nai Brith chapter, chaired the United Israel Appeal campaign in Cape Breton for several years, and, with Diane, funded a house in Or Yehuda, Israel, for after-school programs for immigrant children.

Veteran teacher wins PM's Award

MONTREAL — Gloria Chalupovitsch, a Grade 6 language arts, math and moral education teacher at Merton School in Cote St. Luc, received one of this year's Prime Minister's Awards for Teaching Excellence.

The awards recognize outstanding educators across Canada at the elementary and secondary levels.

Merton School is under the English Montreal School Board.

"I was so overwhelmed when I found out that I won this award," said Chalupovitsch, who has been a teacher for 32 years, and based at Merton for the past 17. "I feel really good and touched that other people have recognized what I've been doing. It's a nice way to cap off my teaching career."

Chalupovitsch was cited for her project-based style of learning, in which her students are encouraged to work to their fullest potential and taught to retrieve, use and relay information by using a variety of technological means.

"Every year, I think of a new, different project," she said. "I want to make sure that every student gets involved and incorporates every kind of style and talent they have."

This year she focused on the 1920s and '30s – especially the religious and racial intolerance that characterized the period – by first screening and discussing with the students some of the classic films of that era such as Charlie Chaplin's The Great Dictator. Afterward, they produced their own documentaries and clay-animation short films. The films will be shot and edited by the students at the National Film Board studios in January and will be completed the following month.

The project culminates in March with a gala premiere night at the school, in which the gym will be transformed into a 1920s movie palace, and will include an Oscar-type awards ceremony and a student vaudeville act.

Coast to Coast

'Those who deny the gas chambers are villainous beings'

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

"To live means to know why one is alive," says the dedication Martin Gray included in the new American version of his autobiography For Those I Loved (Hampton Roads, 2006). The worldwide bestseller has been translated into 26 languages and read by some 30 million people. He gave me a copy when we met in Montreal this fall, after he was the guest of honour at the Salon du Livre de L'Acadie.

Born in Warsaw in 1924 to a Polish Jewish family, Gray was later deported to Treblinka, but he managed to escape. Having also fought in the Warsaw Ghetto, he represents the resilient spirit of the Jewish people.

Martin Gray

Now 84, Gray has forgotten nothing. He fights tirelessly against human barbarity, anti-Semitism, xenophobia and social injustice.

Canadian Jewish News: As someone who witnessed the barbarity of the Nazis, are you outraged by the anti-Semitism rampant throughout the world?

Martin Gray: I thought I would never again hear the cry "death to the Jews" that was part of my youth in Warsaw, in the anti-Semitic Poland of my childhood. But I was wrong. When we closed the book on the 20th century and a new one began, we found that in Paris, in London, in Madrid – in nearly all the countries of Europe – the winds of hate against the Jewish people were rising again. Young people carried away by the overwhelming desire to kill us are choosing to die in order to assassinate our children, our brothers, our wives, our fathers. And others are praising that choice as a heroic act. There is no heroism in the negation of one's own life or its transformation into an instrument of death. Thus, although I had chosen to be silent for more than 10 years, I have begun to speak out again, crying out in my fury, denouncing those who are leading us to new holocausts into which everyone will be drawn– and first of all the Jewish people.

With all the energy I have, which I feel is as great as when I swore through clenched teeth that I would survive to become a witness, I want to fight, in my own way, with my own words, to prevent another cataclysm. I must do this because I am one of the last witnesses to the horrors of the 20th century, one of the last survivors of the Nazi camps. I must do this because I have five children – the youngest of whom is 12-year-old Tom – who will live in this 21st century that has begun so badly. But I must do this not only "for those I loved," but for all mankind.

CJN: So, is Judeophobia a recurring scourge that will never be eradicated?

Gray: Unfortunately, yes. In the streets of Warsaw, for years before the Nazis entered the city, I saw old people and children beaten because they were Jewish. I saw the windows of my father's friends' small boutiques broken by stones. Like my father, these people worked with leather, fur and fabric, making gloves or hats, coats or shoes. Humble people, who asked only to live in peace, to pray, to obey the laws, and who accepted without complaint the idea of being confined in a ghetto. But that wasn't enough for the anti-Semites. It is not enough for them today. It will never be enough for them. What they want is our death. For five kilos of sugar, Polish peasants gave us up to the Nazis, led them into the forests and the houses where we were hidden. And when I learn that in some Muslim country, or in some suburb of Europe, someone has insulted or beaten a Jew, set fire to his house, to his school; when I read that major Arab newspapers say the attack on the Twin Towers on Sept. 11, 2001, was entirely instigated by the Israeli secret service and that Jews who worked in the two towers had been warned not to go there that day, I know that everything I saw is beginning again.

I think of my friends who died in the rubble of those towers in New York. And they join the thousands of bodies that lie side by side in my memory, the ones I had to bury in Treblinka or that I had to leave among the stones in the Warsaw Ghetto in order to keep fighting the Nazi soldiers.

When I see all the signs – an insult here, spitting there, a stone thrown at a windowpane, an inscription, a fire, a persecution, an anti-Semitic expression or joke – I see that the hideous, cannibalistic monster that persecuted the Jews, which I thought had been wrestled to the ground, has reappeared and is raging again with renewed force.

CJN: As a Holocaust survivor, do you worry about the anti-Semitic, negationist words being shouted by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad?

Gray: Those who deny the existence of the Nazi gas chambers and state with disconcerting assurance that the Holocaust is just a myth invented by the Jewish people so that they could claim for themselves a small piece of land in Israel are abject, villainous beings resolved to assassinate the memory of the Jewish people.

Today, one of the principal leaders of the negationist movement is Ahmadinejad. That fascist Islamist is a fierce anti-Semite. We must muzzle people like him to prevent them from carrying out their morbid plans. When Hitler wrote Mein Kampf, his manifesto of anti-Jewish hate, most people in the world believed that his were merely hollow words. But those words were quickly transformed into tanks, strong military armies, concentration camps and then death camps. Today, many people believe Ahmedinejad's anti-Semitic rhetoric is just hackneyed, bombastic discourse used for political propaganda. How wrong they are! The Iranian president is an obtuse dictator who truly believes what he is saying.

The Iran of the 21st century represents a great danger, not only to the Jews and Israel, but to all humanity. Ahmadinejad wants to play a role similar to that of Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser in the early '60s. He is trying to galvanize the anemic, famished Arab peoples who have been oppressed by dictatorial regimes. These are people at bay who desperately need to be shown how to get out of the chaotic situation they find themselves in, just as the Germans needed a Hitler in the early '30s.

CJN: What does being Jewish mean to you?

Gray: For me, to be Jewish is to be a man who marches with his arms stretched out to the sky, who tries not to be dishonest. When I was in difficult situations, I was sometimes obliged to be dishonest to survive. To be a Jew is something you will be to the end of your life. I have suffered as a Jew, I have fought as a Jew. Even though I am not at all religious, the harsh experiences I have lived through allow me to state that I am a full-fledged Jew.

CJN: Are you optimistic or pessimistic about the future of humankind?

Gray: I am optimistic by nature, but I think the future of humankind is going to be played out in the next 20 years. We live in a dangerous world where the future is increasingly uncertain. A large part of humanity could easily descend into violence. One of the major causes of violence in the world is poverty, an endemic plague that feeds violence and terrorism. People who are hungry or out of work may become violent. Social inequalities exacerbate despair, which often emerges in violence.

The best way to address violence is to have greater justice in our societies and greater equality among men. The destitute, the helpless unemployed who live in a port city where the millionaires' yachts are moored, how could they not get angry? The inequality will always crush them. It's a serious social problem that is hard to resolve. Yet, I know that absolute equality among men is not possible. It's a dream, an impossible Utopia.

CJN: At 84, where do you get the strength to continue to fight?

Gray: It was my father, for whom I always had a deep affection and admiration, who encouraged me to continue to fight in order to live. My father was shot before my eyes in 1943 in the Warsaw Ghetto. Before the cowardly assassination, when we were fighting fiercely against our Nazi executioners in the eviscerated alleys of the ghetto, he said: "My son, today we are obliged to kill, but don't forget that life is sacred." He did not say, "Your life is sacred," but, "Life is sacred." Those fundamentally important words have given me the strength to pursue my fight for life. If I had tried to save only my life, I would never have gotten out of Treblinka alive. I escaped from that hell because he told me that life is sacred. I therefore had to be a witness, to shout out my anger.

CJN: You believe words can change the destiny of a man.

Gray: Absolutely. I firmly believe in the strength and the power of words… I have received almost a million letters from readers who wrote to tell me how deeply my story had moved and distressed them. Often, words are not merely words or syllables. When the words come from deep within a human soul, from the heart, they have an unexpected power.

Every family has its own brisket variations

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

You can never have too many brisket recipes. I often used to say that whereas people were always asking me for yet another stellar cheesecake or consummate chocolate torte, no one ever beat a path to my door imploring me for a better brisket recipe.

It got chuckles, but the truth is, it's untrue. People seem to be on the lookout for bigger and more unique and still easier to prepare brisket, as often as they are sniffing around for a better tollhouse cookie or a better brownie. It is just one of those things.

With a Friday night supper always around the corner, I am continually creating new brisket recipes. It just seems the possibilities are endless.

We all have Bubbie's recipe, Aunt Ida's best brisket, and Dad's mother's aunt's sister-in-law's second cousin's brisket recipe. We tend to alternate between making the tried and true and looking for a marvelous new one that tastes different and gets rave reviews, a brisket that tastes – well, not like a brisket, a wonderfully backhanded Jewish compliment.

Brisket happens to be the quintessential Jewish holiday and Shabbat main dish for many families. It is so classic, so traditional, that we make it by rote. We search for a perfect brisket at the same store we always go to. We use the tried and true recipe our families expect. It's comforting because it is the same. It's boring because it is the same.

Brisket is also a most unusual meat. It is tough and sinewy roasted and eaten as is. But let it soak or braise in its own juices, and you have a completely different dish.

MY FAMOUS COLA BRISKET

What goes better with latkes than this deep flavoured, addictive cola brisket? This way of preparing brisket is an all-time winner.

1 beef brisket, approx. 4 lbs., 1st or 2nd cut
2 tbsp. oil
1 cup chopped onions
1 cup chopped celery salt to taste
pepper to taste
2 crushed garlic cloves
2 tsp. paprika
½ cup ketchup
¼ cup hot water
1 tbsp. onion soup powder
1 tsp. Italian seasoning
1 cup cola

Preheat oven to 350. Place meat in a large roasting pan and cover with oil on all sides. Sprinkle on onions and celery. Season with salt, pepper and paprika. Place crushed garlic on top. Mix ketchup with hot water, onion soup powder and Italian spices to dissolve dry ingredients. Add cola and pour mixture over meat.

Roast 2½-3 hours, covered with foil, opening to baste every 20-30 minutes. Serve sliced when done, or slice entire brisket and reheat in gravy next day for 30 minutes in a 350-degree oven for extra-tender slices. Serves 6-8.

TRADITIONAL FRIDAY NIGHT BRISKET IN RED WINE

A dry or medium wine is perfect for this classic brisket. This is a good recipe to have in your collection.

1 5-7 lb. beef brisket
1 can pareve mushroom soup
salt, pepper for dusting
1 tbsp. sweet paprika
2 tbsp. onion soup powder
¾ cup sweet red wine
2 tbsp. fresh parsley – minced
3 cloves garlic – minced
1 small onion, sliced
2 tbsp. light olive or vegetable oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Place meat on a large piece of foil. Season with salt and pepper and rub with paprika. Combine all remaining ingredients and spread on meat. Wrap snugly in foil. Roast for 3 hours or until tender.

Wrap well and refrigerate several hours or overnight. Skim excess fat, then slice thinly and reheat for serving at 325, about 1-2 hours.

STEAK STYLE BRISKET WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS AND MUSHROOMS

This is relatively simple if you have steak spice on hand. Steak spice is a mix of salt, peppercorns and coriander. This brisket is not at all what Bubbie or the deli would make – it is however, highly seasoned and zesty.

1 5-7 pound brisket
2 tsp. olive oil
2 large cloves of garlic
salt and pepper to taste
¼ cup steak spice
4 large Bermuda onions, thinly sliced
4 cups sliced mushrooms
2 cups unsalted beef bouillon

Preheat oven to 350. Rub brisket with cut side of garlic and put garlic in roasting pan with brisket. Smear on oil then rub or coat top of roast with steak spice using the palm of your hand.

Pour bouillon into roasting pan around meat. Garnish roast, top and sides, with onions and mushrooms. Cover roast with foil.

Roast 3-4 hours until done, removing foil cover about 30-45 minutes before it is ready. Slice meat then return to pan with pan juices and onions and mushrooms (add additional water or bouillon if required). Reduce heat to 325 and roast 1½ to 2 hours until tender. Serves 7-9.

MANDY PATINKIN'S MOTHER'S BRISKET OR SWEET AND SOUR BRISKET

This is a sweet and sour style brisket best served with a traditional noodle kugel and strains of Mandy singing Yossel, Yossel from his Mamaloshen CD.

1 large brisket
seasoned salt
½ cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 cup chili sauce or ketchup

Preheat oven to 325. Season brisket well with seasoning. Sprinkle or rub meat with the brown sugar, then drizzle with cider vinegar. Frost with the chili sauce, using the back of a spoon.

Bake uncovered until semi-tender. Cover and roast until done – total time from 1½ to three hours.

Remove meat from gravy and cool. Allow gravy to cool. Skim fat. Add water to dilute as gravy will be a little strong. Taste and adjust seasonings.

Let brisket cool, then slice meat. Place slices in an ovenproof casserole. Cover with gravy and seal tightly with aluminum foil. Heat until tender, another 45-90 minutes (still at 325). Makes 10-12 servings.

ROASTED PICKLED BRISKET

This brisket is great hot, but really shines served cold, sliced thin. The pickled brisket (pre-pickled and available at most kosher meat markets) is simmered (if you are adept at using a pressure cooker, that is also a way to go), then roasted in a "wet" rub of apricot jam and mustard. It results in a pinkish coloured meat reminiscent of pastrami. Serve this with bright yellow mustard on rye.

1 5-7 lb. pickled brisket
1 cup apricot jam
⅓ cup Dijon style mustard
¼ cup water or ginger ale water for simmering

Rinse off a fair amount of the pickling spices of the brisket. Place in a large pot, filled almost half way up the sides of the brisket with water. Bring to a boil, then reduce heat, and simmer about two hours.

Allow to cool until you can comfortably handle meat. Preheat oven to 350. Place brisket in a roasting pan. Make a marinade of the jam, mustard and ginger ale. Smear over brisket.

Roast until tender, about 90 minutes. Cool, then slice. Serves 7-10.

Iranian regime hit with toothless sanctions

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Analysis

The U.N. sanctions package for Iran might have come with one of those labels so familiar from other seasonal deliveries: some assembly required, teeth not included.

After weeks of struggling between the United States and Europe, which favored tough measures to stem the Persian nuclear tide, and Russia and China, which maintain close business ties with Iran, the U.N. Security Council's verdict this weekend was a mash of tough legal terms attached to vague prescriptions.

To be sure, the 15-0 decision was under Chapter Seven of the U.N. charter, meaning its decision carried the force of international law – a hard-won victory for the U.S.-Europe team, which had failed to secure Chapter Seven status for the resolution that ended Israel's war with Hezbollah this summer.

The problem is, it's not clear what exactly is being sanctioned.

The first provisions essentially reiterate longstanding international demands that Iran co-operate with nuclear inspectors and suspend the enrichment of uranium, a necessary step in the manufacture of a nuclear weapon. Iran denies its goal is nuclear weaponry, but U.N. nuclear inspectors have cast strong suspicions on such denials. It sets a deadline of Feb. 21, 2007, for compliance – the third or fourth such deadline since last summer.

A raft of subsequent provisions bans the export to Iran of technology or training that might have "dual uses" – in other words, for civilian or for nuclear weaponry.

But there are substantial exceptions for the dual-use bans, especially related to Iran's Bushehr reactor, which is being built with Russian assistance. This creates a loophole, even though Russia and Iran maintain that Bushehr is strictly for civilian use.

In any case, according to the picture painted by Israeli intelligence, the usefulness of the dual-use ban is long past due, at least as far as training goes: Iran is just months away from the know-how it needs to make a nuclear bomb, Israeli officials have suggested.

The new powers the resolution accords to the international community come toward the end, when it lists 10 entities and 12 individuals designated to have their funds frozen. Even these, however, come with substantial exceptions for deals made prior to the resolution. The exceptions do not include prior dual-use deals, but the caveat is almost meaningless considering the fungibility of money in such international dealings.

The Los Angeles Times reported that Iranian missile manufacturer Aerospace Industries Organization was removed from the list at the last minute.

More substantially, the resolution does not ban the travel of the individuals or the company directors, which has been routine in past cases. This enables black market trade.

The vagueness of the document was immediately apparent in how the ambassadors to the Security Council described its meaning before its passage on Saturday.

According to the U.N. report, Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said it would help "ensure confidence" in Iran's existing nuclear program. U.S. envoy Alejandro Wolff said it should encourage Iran to "relent from its confrontational posture."

U.S. officials underscored the defeat the resolution handed to Iranian diplomacy, which had pressed hard for no resolution.

"It's a big spotlight. It is going to be humiliating for Iran," said Nicholas Burns, an undersecretary of state, in a conference call with reporters after the vote. "The Iranians have launched a pretty vigorous international campaign over the last few months to prevent this from happening."

Burns said the United States would encourage its allies to broaden the sanctions – an acknowledgment, however, that enforcement was pretty much what U.N. member states made of it.

"We don't think this resolution is enough in itself," he said. "We want the international community to take further action, and we're certainly not going to put all of our eggs in a U.N. basket. We're going to try to convince countries, especially the European Union countries and Japan, to consider some of the financial measures that we have undertaken. This is a campaign we've launched to convince some of the international lending institutions and private banks that they should shut down lending to Iran."

Some analysts said the details of what sanctions do and do not apply matter less than the resolution's legal heft. A statement from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee suggested that the Security Council's willingness to invoke its law enforcement powers through Chapter Seven was the real breakthrough.

"This sanctions resolution is a critical and necessary step toward ensuring that Tehran's radical regime realizes serious consequences for its defiance of U.N. Security Council demands to end its nuclear pursuit and to ensuring that Iran is not permitted to possess the world's most dangerous weapons," AIPAC said in a statement. "It sets a clear path for Iran – end its nuclear enrichment activities or face continued international and diplomatic isolation."

Iran's reaction was, for a regime that periodically wishes Israel off the map, relatively restrained. The Iranian envoy, Javad Zarif, spent much of his response time blasting Israel's nuclear capability as the real threat to the region, but added that Iran would "go to any length to allay" the Security Council's "so-called proliferation concerns, in spite of the fact that we all know they are no more than unfounded and self-serving sheer excuses."

That seemed to remove Iran's earlier threat that it would ban U.N. inspectors in case of a resolution.

NATO interested in Iran's nuke program

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — NATO has begun taking a major interest in intelligence information about Iran's nuclear program, according to Israeli defence officials who recently held talks with senior officers in the western military alliance.

NATO's interest stems from growing concern that diplomacy will ultimately fail, the Israeli officials told the Jerusalem Post last week, and that military action will be necessary to stop Iran's race to obtain nuclear weapons.

Earlier last month, Israel Defence Forces Military Intelligence (MI) hosted a NATO conference on global terrorism and intelligence, after which high-ranking MI officers said Israel planned to establish an intelligence-sharing mechanism with NATO.

"There is a growing interest on NATO's part regarding the intelligence collected around the world on Iran's nuclear program," a senior defence official said. "They want to get to know the material just in case."

According to the official, Iran was, until now, a "taboo" issue for NATO and was rarely brought up in official functions and talks between member countries. The official said that recently senior military officials in NATO have expressed growing interest in the up-to-date Israeli assessment on Iran.

A diplomatic official said that Iran was a "sensitive issue" for NATO and that while there were certainly countries – like the United States – that would like to see possible NATO involvement on the issue, other members from Europe were so far preventing this from happening.

"There are people who want this issue to come up and want NATO to start talking about Iran," the official said. An important organization with great military capabilities, NATO, the official said, should at least begin to discuss the nuclear threat emanating from Iran even without connection to possible military action against the Islamic Republic.

"This should be on NATO's agenda," the official said. "But since NATO works by consensus among its members, countries have the ability to prevent discussions on certain issues."

In line with the efforts to enhance military co-operation with NATO, the IDF plans to dispatch a navy officer to Naples in the coming weeks, where he will participate in Operation Active Endeavor.

NATO launched Operation Active Endeavor in the wake of 9/11 and has succeeded in bringing together a number of countries from the Mediterranean that work together in a joint headquarters based out of Naples and share information concerning naval terror.

'We have seen a lot of amazing things'

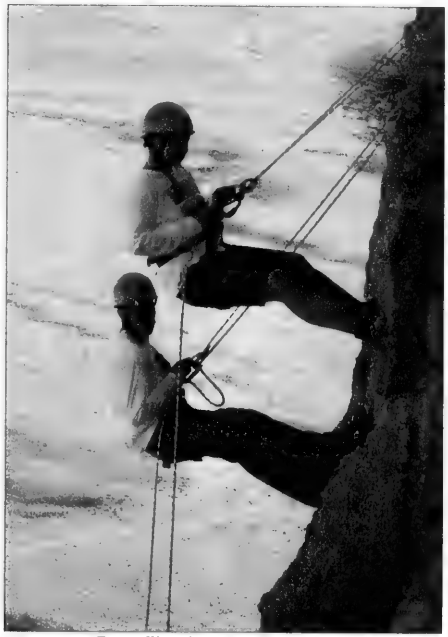
"From day one, the soldiers really connected with the Canadians; they have really become one big, cohesive group, and the soldiers have really shared their experiences, both in the army, and as Israeli civilians, with the participants," Amitai adds.

Trip participant Evan Wainberg, 26, from Toronto, says that meeting the soldiers has been the highlight of the trip.

"We have seen a lot of amazing things and done a lot of amazing things here," says Wainberg, who works as an alternative therapist. "But I think the main thing that I'm going to take away from this is the relationship that we have developed with the soldiers.

"In Canada we are very far removed from the conflicts here… But now we have this personal, direct connection. It's not abstract anymore. Now every time we hear something, everyone who went on this trip will be thinking about these 11 people and hoping that they are OK, and understanding that there are actual people involved, because we know them."

"Just seeing these soldiers, and how much they put into their country to sustain it is unbelievable," says 22-year-old Alex Shinwell from Toronto.



Rappelling down a mountainface.

"Being here with them has totally inspired me to explore my Jewish roots," says Shinwell, a Trent University student. "I feel much more tied into the Jewish community that is Israel, than I ever have to any Jewish community in Canada. Having a community to attach myself to feels fantastic."

McGill University graduate Carol Burbank, 23, says she is in awe of the soldiers.

"They have contributed so much to this trip. They are kids our age and they have a completely different life experience. I am so proud of them and the love they have for this country," Burbank says.

Alexandra Rosenfeld, a 22-year-old law student at Carleton University, says that meeting the soldiers has given her perspective on what is really going on in the region.

"Bonding with them has been amazing; they have become our best friends," she says.

"I always wanted to help Israel, but now that I know soldiers who are fighting to keep this country on the map, I want to do so much more."

For Amichai Bouskila, 18, an Israeli-born participant from Vancouver, the meeting with the soldiers was particularly poignant since he is currently at army age himself.

His family left Israel for Canada when he was 12 years old, and the trip marked his first time back to the country since then.

"Listening to these soldiers talk about Israel and the army has been incredible," he says. "I feel so connected to them. I am definitely thinking of moving here and even going to the army."

Bouskila is not the only participant for whom the meeting with soldiers inspired him to consider joining the IDF.

Andrew Bell is a 26-year-old career soldier with the Canadian army and is currently undergoing pre-deployment training before he leaves for Afghanistan to serve a six-month tour of duty as part of a provincial reconstruction team.

Bell says meeting the Israeli soldiers has been a life-changing experience.

"I feel such an amazing sense of attachment to Israel and I really want to help out. I want to come and join the Israeli army and fight with these soldiers. To serve in the IDF would be a great accomplishment for me… These are amazing soldiers, amazing civilians, amazing people."

But the Canadian participants were not the only ones who developed a connection with the people they met.

"Spending such intense time with these Canadians has been amazing for us," says Ivtach L., 24, an Israeli Air Force officer (IAF), who spoke of behalf of the 11 soldiers, among whom was an F16 pilot, a soldier from a reconnaissance unit, a soldier from a demolition unit and an IDF spokesperson.

"We have really connected with them, and touring around with them has really opened our eyes to some things. I feel like I am discovering Israel all over again," he says.

"It's important to deepen the relationship between Israelis and Canadian Jews. We stand to learn a lot from each other."

More than 13,000 young Jewish adults will visit Israel through a birthright israel trip this winter season – the largest number of participants in one season, to date.

During its six years of activity, over 110,000 young Jews from some 51 countries have visited Israel as part of the Taglit-birthright israel program.

Israel Briefs

Egypt: Shalit alive

Egypt said Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who is held hostage in the Gaza Strip, is alive. "We are working to release him and we know that he's alive," Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told reporters during a visit to Israel. Egypt has been the main mediator in efforts to recover Shalit, who was abducted by Hamas and other Palestinian gunmen in a June 25 cross-border raid. Shalit's captors have demanded that Israel release some 1,400 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for the soldier. Israel has signalled that it could agree to a less lopsided swap.

Israelis seek Syrian peace but want to keep Golan

Most Israelis want peace talks with Syria, but not at the cost of giving up the Golan. A poll published last week by Yediot Achronot found that 67 per cent of Israelis think their government should respond to recent peace overtures from Syria by resuming negotiations that stalled in 2000. But an almost equal number, 66 per cent, said they would be opposed to returning the Golan Heights to Syria, even under a peace treaty. Thirty-two percent of respondents were against new talks with Damascus, and 33 per cent said they would support giving up the Golan as part of a peace deal.

Israel to target Gaza's Qassem rocket launchers

Israel announced it would resume military strikes against Palestinian rocketeers in the Gaza Strip. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's security cabinet made the decision last Wednesday after a rocket salvo the previous day from Gaza wounded two boys, one critically, in the Israeli border town of Sderot. Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas declared a Gaza truce Nov. 26, but it has been regularly violated by terrorist rocket crews, most of them from Islamic Jihad or Abbas' Fatah movement.

Israel's economy on the rise

Israel's economy rose 12 places in an international listing. Based on a survey by The Economist, Globes reported that Israel is the world's 36th largest economy. The survey graded nations' economies in 2001-05 as compared with 1980-84, and ranked economies on the basis of their five-year average GDP in current dollars. Some of the biggest climbers were in Asia: Singapore rose 20 places to No. 39; Taiwan rose 14 places to No. 18; and both South Korea and Hong Kong rose 12 places to Nos. 11 and 30, respectively. China rose four notches to No. 6, while Venezuela fell 12 places to No. 37. Iran fell 16 places to 33, and Saudi Arabia dropped from 15th place to 22nd.

Ben-Gurion plans Muslim prayer room

Ben-Gurion Airport is planning to create a Muslim prayer room. The Israel Airports Authority announced that the room, suggested by the Interior Ministry, would be set up in the main terminal. It is to have a water trough for washing feet and hands, and a bench at its entrance. The room, which will provide copies of the Qur'an, will be carpeted and have an alcove that faces Mecca. The prayer room is part of an effort to accommodate Muslim passengers on the part of the IAA, which recently launched an Arabic-language website.

More Qassems fired at Israel

Palestinians fired eight Qassem rockets from northern Gaza toward Israel last Friday, Army Radio reported. One missile landed near Sderot, while another five hit the western Negev. No one was wounded and no damage was reported.Two rockets landed inside Palestinian Authority territories.

Lebanon war report handed down

The General Staff convened last Friday to hear former chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Shomron's findings on Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz's performance during the war in Lebanon this past summer. Shomron's report did not detail steps to take against specific individuals in the Israel Defence Forces. Instead, the findings cited a list of shortcomings in the transfer of orders from commanders to the soldiers in the field.

Northern reconstruction complete

Maj.-Gen. Amos Yaron, the government co-ordinator for the Reconstruction of Infrastructures and Institutions in Haifa and the north, notified Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that his team has completed the repair of most of the damages from last summer's war, according to the Prime Minister's Office.

Bangladeshi suffers for advocating Israel ties

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

WASHINGTON — For a man who says he could be condemned to death as early as next month, Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury is surprisingly calm.

Choudhury's crime: calling for diplomatic ties between his native Bangladesh and the State of Israel.

"The High Court has ruled that by conveying the message of the rise of Islamic militancy in Bangladesh to Jews and Christians and by advocating relations between Dhaka and Jerusalem, I have damaged the image of Bangladesh worldwide," Choudhury said.

The 41-year-old journalist and editor spoke to JTA in a 20-minute phone interview recently from Dhaka, the Bangladeshi capital. He said his trial for sedition, blasphemy and treason, which began in September, will resume Jan. 22.

Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister and attorney general, announced he would defend Choudhury. A past president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Cotler has represented prisoners of conscience Nelson Mandela, Jacobo Timerman and Natan Sharansky.

Choudhury, who is free on bail, said there is little chance of receiving a fair trial and he probably will be sentenced to death.

"The judicial system is corrupted by Islamic radicals," he said. "By continuing this trial and convicting me, they want to send the message that anyone else in Bangladesh who thinks as I do will face the same consequences."

Choudhury is the editor and publisher of the Weekly Blitz, an English-language newspaper founded in 2003 that has 7,500 print subscribers and another 40,000 readers online. The newspaper is read regularly by Bangladeshi policy makers and businesspeople, as well as foreign diplomats.

A Muslim, Choudhury first came into contact with Jews in the early 1990s while working as Dhaka correspondent for the Russian news agency Tass.

He established friendships with Jewish colleagues despite the anti-Semitic propaganda so prevalent in Bangladesh, which is 85 per cent Muslim and ranks as the world's third-most populous Muslim nation after Indonesia and Pakistan.

"When I was a child, my father always encouraged us not to believe the Friday afternoon sermons of hate coming from the mosque," said Choudhury, who began a dialogue with editors at the Jerusalem Post three years ago and eventually was invited to Israel by the Hebrew Writers Association.

Choudhury never made it.

On Nov. 29, 2003, as he was about to board a plane in Dhaka for the circuitous journey to Jerusalem, where he was to attend a conference on the media's role in education for peace, Choudhury was arrested and his passport confiscated.

He "spent the next 17 months in hellish prison conditions, including torture, denial of medical attention and isolation" as the government tried to build a case that Choudhury was an Israeli spy, said David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee.

He was released in April 2005, thanks largely to the efforts of U.S. congressman Mark Kirk and Richard Benkin, a Jewish activist from Chicago.

Yet the sedition charge is pending, and in October, a mob of 40 Islamic militants beat Choudhury in his Dhaka office – three months after the office was firebombed.

Choudhury initially was charged with passport violations; the sedition charges were added nearly two months later.

In late October, the Washington Times published an editorial urging the Bush administration to suspend $63 million (US) in annual aid to Bangladesh unless the charges were dropped. Besides the AJCommittee, other organizations outspoken in the case include Reporters Without Borders, Scholars for Peace in the Middle East and the Committee to Protect Journalists.

In an article in the Montreal Gazette, Cotler asserted, "It is not Choudhury who should be on trial; rather, it is the Bangladesh authorities who have violated his fundamental rights guaranteed under the Bangladesh constitution, international treaties as well as the basic principles of criminal justice."

Cotler noted the violation of Choudhury's rights occurred despite Bangladesh's involvement in the Canada-Bangladesh Rule of Law Project, which advocates joint initiatives to promote fundamental human rights and due process of law.

Shamsher Chowdhury, Bangladesh's ambassador to the United States, insisted Choudhury is a liar and a criminal.

"In Bangladesh, nobody is a prisoner of conscience," he stated. "There is no such thing as putting a journalist behind bars for expressing his views. We have total freedom of the press. If he's saying he was arrested for advocating ties with Israel, then he's not telling the truth. That cannot be a charge. That's not sedition.

"In 2003, he leaked very classified information about the government which we thought endangered state security," Chowdhury said.

Choudhury responded angrily to the ambassador's claims, calling them "nothing but a damn lie."

Benkin, the Chicago activist, said the Bangladeshi government "has never produced a scintilla of credible evidence against [Choudhury]. Over three years ago, they said he was guilty. They tortured him for 17 months and they're still carrying out this persecution."

In Israel, is good will enough?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

After the plethora of goodwill gestures Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made in his meeting on Dec. 23 with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, politicians and pundits on both sides are asking one question: will it be enough to kick-start the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process?

Leaders on both sides are optimistic. They see Olmert's moves as part of a new and wider American plan for Israeli-Palestinian accommodation.

Pundits, however, are downbeat. Few believe Abbas will be able to create the necessary conditions on the Palestinian side for successful negotiations with Israel.

The meeting was the first between the two leaders since Olmert's election victory last March.

Its primary purpose was to help strengthen Abbas and his relatively moderate Fatah movement in its ongoing power struggle with the radical Hamas.

Olmert's moves were part of a two-pronged plan: to show the Palestinian people that more can be achieved through Abbas-style dialogue with Israel than armed confrontation, and to strengthen Fatah militarily by allowing it the wherewithal to build its armed forces ahead of a possible showdown with Hamas over approaches to Israel.

With this in mind, Olmert made the following goodwill gestures:

- Israel would release $100 million in frozen Palestinian tax money.
- It would remove dozens of checkpoints to facilitate Palestinian movement in the West Bank.
- It would ease passage in and out of Gaza to enable the free flow of goods and medicines.
- It would consider freeing a few dozen Palestinian prisoners in early January to mark Id el-Adha, the Muslim feast of the sacrifice, ahead of the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier held by Hamas-affiliated militiamen.
- It would agree to set up joint committees to consider further prisoner releases and the removal of key Fatah operatives from Israel's wanted list.
- It would allow Egypt to supply Fatah with 1,900 Kalashnikov rifles.
- It would allow the Palestinian Badr Brigade, currently stationed in Jordan, to redeploy in Gaza.

Olmert went out of his way to show friendship and respect for Abbas and his presidency, waiting for Abbas outside the prime minister's residence and embracing him warmly on arrival.

Olmert also made a major symbolic gesture: for the first time, Palestinian flags were flown in an official Israeli state building.

"Abu Mazen is an adversary – he is a not an easy adversary, but with an adversary like this, there is, perhaps, a chance of dialogue that will bring an accord between us and the Palestinians," Olmert said in a speech last week, his first public comments following his talks with Abbas.

Senior Abbas aide Saeb Erekat also was cautiously optimistic.

"It would be a mistake to think that all the problems could be solved in one meeting, but the meeting improved the feeling on both sides," he said.

Writing in the mass circulation daily Yediot Achronot, political analyst Itamar Eichner summed up the new friendship between Olmert and Abbas.

"They have a common interest not to mention a common enemy: to block the rise of Hamas, which enjoys massive support from Iran," he wrote.

The Israeli moves complement American and European efforts to strengthen Fatah.

The Americans are soon expected to release about $100 million to Abbas, and they also have been training Fatah forces.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, in a mid-December visit to Ramallah, outlined economic projects from which the Palestinians could benefit if they reached accommodation with Israel.

All of these moves are part of a wider plan for Israeli-Palestinian peace talks that has begun to take shape in the U.S. State Department. The new American thinking envisages leapfrogging stage one of the internationally approved "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian peace and moving directly to stage two, which calls for the establishment of an interim Palestinian state with provisional borders.

Discarding stage one means that talks could go ahead without the Palestinians first stopping all violence and without Israel dismantling illegal West Bank outposts.

The idea is that once a mini-state is established, those things would be much easier for the parties to handle.

By strengthening Abbas, the Americans hope to create conditions for the establishment of a new Palestinian government that would recognize Israel and become a serious negotiating partner. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to make a visit to the region soon to press the plan.

The American approach is not much different from ideas being bandied about in the Israeli Foreign Ministry and supported by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

Livni, who favours going directly for an interim Palestinian state, told a meeting of Europe-based Israeli ambassadors in Jerusalem on Dec. 24 that the Olmert-Abbas meeting was important not as "a lone gesture, but as a process of which gestures are a part." She added that in her view, moderate Arab and Muslim states should be involved as well.

On the Palestinian side, Abbas also expressed the hope that the meeting would lead to peace talks.

Israeli pundits, however, are skeptical. They doubt Abbas will be able to carry off the necessary first step: the establishment of a Palestinian government that makes the right noises about recognizing Israel, accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements and renouncing violence.

"First that must happen, but as we know from experience, something on the way is bound to go wrong, and all we'll get is more of the same," political analyst Ben Caspit wrote in the Ma'ariv daily.

"Many meetings between Palestinian and Israeli leaders have taken place up till now, but it seems that never have two such weak partners sat on either side of the table – Abu Mazen on the verge of a civil war and Olmert after a war and embroiled in an investigation," Caspit wrote.

"They have a great many qualities in common: not a bad vision and considerable courage. On the other hand, they are lacking in leadership and confidence, exhausted and shackled by political constraints, enemies inside and out."

The trouble is, Palestinian society is deeply divided over how to proceed.

In Abbas' view, the Palestinians will always be outgunned and therefore will lose in any violent confrontation with Israel. Thus, negotiation is the way forward.

Hamas holds that time is on the Palestinians' side, and the best path is to establish a temporary truce, use it to stockpile weapons and wait for Iran to become the dominant regional power.

Israeli intelligence estimates that if Abbas is able to rekindle a peace process, Hamas will escalate its violence against Israel in a bid to extinguish it.

Complicating matters even further, the fight on the Palestinian street is not only between Fatah and Hamas. Poverty and the breakdown of law and order have spawned violent, armed gangs loyal only to themselves and contemptuous of authority, whether from Fatah or Hamas.

They will probably continue to use terror against Israel, even if Abbas and Hamas agree to a ceasefire.

If the latest American initiative is to succeed, it will have to find a way of neutralizing both Hamas and the street gangs. Otherwise, new peace prospects will drown in a sea of Palestinian chaos.

Making peace at the best of times would not be easy. In these circumstances, it will be a very tall order indeed.

Family comedy flies for Israel

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

A 55-year-old Israeli air force squadron commander retires and finds himself mired in the perilous battlefield of home as the odd man out among his wife and two daughters. His arrival is like parachuting into the calm pool of their routine, creating ripples of confrontation.

Of course, it's not just gender that makes for the laughs in Anat Gov's comedy House Husband, playing in Hebrew with English surtitles for two benefit performances for Beit Halochem in Toronto Jan. 28 at the City Playhouse.

Rachel Yane, artistic director of the Montreal-based Sabra Theatre, says the play speaks to anyone who's recently retired, whether male or female, and to their family who has to deal with it.

"When I sold my giftware business last year, I felt I lost my identity, in a way. But I don't retire, I rewire," says Yane, 54, who has succeeded in careers as an artist, art dealer, gift crafter, furniture maker, and theatre person.

She still aspires to be a filmmaker and is busier than ever in the theatre, rehearsing a cast of six (including herself, Chen Argaman, Dudu Razon, Avi Reiter, Moran Reiter and Helena Stesin).

"We get together to work on the play nights and weekends. One of us is a travel agent, one works in a bank, one is an executive and two are students. We do this as volunteers because we love the theatre and it's for a good cause," says Yane

Gov is one of Israel's most popular playwrights. She is also known for writing for the TV series Ken, Ma? (Yes, What?) which likely gave her the idea for House Husband, since it was about an army man contending with five women at home. She's written for the Jerusalem Khan Theatre and the Cameri Theatre of Tel Aviv.

Israelis love the play, which won the 2004 Israel Theatre Prize for Best Comedy. It helps them laugh at normal concerns outside of their often stressful surroundings.

"The protagonist, Zeevik, expects his family to fill the vacuum left by his job. But pilots are regarded as the crème de la crème, as heroes, and at home he's stripped of all his ranks," says Yane, who herself served in the Israeli army before coming to Canada in 1974.

"Everyday realities are new to him, like listening to his children and even to his own feelings which had been suppressed in the army. Zeevik confides in the squadron's doctor and the two come up with a plan to reassert his place in the house, with surprising results."

Throw in the angst of a teenage daughter, as well as his wife's patience being pushed to its limits, the crises of an older daughter and language lessons for their Russian housekeeper, and the laughs keep rolling in.

Yane does more than triple duty in the play. Not only is she the director but she plays the wife/mother and also serves as producer and stage manager, miraculously juggling all of her duties simultaneously.

Her own family is involved, too. Husband Barry, a door manufacturer, had the set built. Son Eitan runs the sound board.

"Maybe one of the more important themes in the play is how we shouldn't take anything for granted: not the love of your spouse, or your family or your health. The playwright touches on human aspects that everyone can see in themselves," Yane says.

There are two shows, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m. and 7:30 p.m., at the City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Drive, Thornhill, On. $36 ($18 tax receipt.) Seniors/Students discounts. Call 905-695-0611.

Playwrights take top prizes in national contest

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

One playwright wrote a one-act play about a small-town man who moves to big city Toronto and struggles with his homosexuality, while another wrote a full-length play about a homeless woman who doubles as a housekeeper and a problem-solver for three Rosedale-area men.

One playwright is relatively new to the theatre scene, having only been seriously writing plays for about 10 years, while the other got his big break more than 50 years ago when his play, The Big Leap, was performed at the Royal Alexandra Theatre in Toronto.

Leo Orenstein

Ron Fromstein

But what Ron Fromstein, 33, and Leo Orenstein, 87, have in common is that in November, these two Jewish playwrights from Toronto became winners at Theatre BC's 18th annual Canadian National Playwriting Competition.

Fromstein, who has a literature degree from the University of Guelph, won a $750 award for his one-act play called The Big Smoke, which is about a young man who comes to Toronto from small-town Ontario and struggles with the fact that he is gay.

"I have him trying to come to terms with it in a big city. Because he's got certain values, he is sort of anti-gay and I guess that's what made it… dramatic in some way," said Fromstein, who also won the 2004 Toronto Fringe 24-hour playwriting contest and placed second and third in 2005 and 2006.

"It's sort of serious, but then funny at times. He ends up moving into the gay village in Toronto, because he feels like it's the only part of the city that feels like a small town."

Fromstein added that he was excited about winning the Theatre BC award, and although it wasn't a complete shock, it was hard for him to anticipate how his work would be received.

"You never know who is going to be reading it, and you never know if someone is going to be offended by something you've written," Fromstein said.

The Montreal-born Orenstein has written, produced and directed for stage, radio, film and television.

> Thrilled that they've been recognized by a national theatre organization, and they hope the awards will mean better exposure and more opportunities

Although Orenstein considers The Big Leap – a play about a man who goes over Niagara Falls in a barrel – his biggest commercial success, he said winning the $1,000 award for the best full-length play at this year's Theatre BC competition is special because it's a reaffirmation of his talents.

"To get a play accepted now at my age is very affirming to me, because it's like, 'Gee I'm a writer again and I'm being accepted again,' so it's a real feather in my cap that somebody would recognize me," Orenstein said.

Homeless Hannah, the play that won him the award, is "written as a love song to a woman," he said.

"It's about a homeless woman who gets a job working for a retired professor in Rosedale and he has a son who is in the advertising business and his son has a friend who is a poet, who is a kind of a wondering vagabond. The homeless woman comes into this household and discovers that each of them has a big problem, and she helps them with their problems."

Both Fromstein and Orenstein are thrilled that they've been recognized by a national theatre organization, and they hope the awards will mean better exposure and more opportunities.

"This is a national contest, so it's an easier one to springboard from," Fromstein said.

"I've had plays produced in Ontario and eastern Canada, but never out in the West, so I am very happy that Theatre BC accepted me there because that means that my audience is enlarging," Orenstein said.

Fromstein said that there will be a private reading of The Big Smoke this month in Toronto through Mirvish Productions and Orenstein expects to travel in April to Nanaimo, where there is going to be a stage reading of his play, Homeless Hannah.

ALFRED UHRY PLAY LAST NIGHT OF BALLYHOO AT LEAH POSLUNS THEATRE

Teatron Theatre presents The Last Night of Ballyhoo, the award-winning bittersweet comedy by Alfred Uhry. The play is set in Atlanta during the Christmas of 1939, just as Gone With the Wind is having its world première and Hitler is invading Poland. Meanwhile, Atlanta's elitist German Jews are more concerned with finding the best dates and dresses for Ballyhoo, the social event of the season.

Directed by Ari Weisberg and featuring Irving Dobbs, Lorn Eisen, Jenna Harris, Vanessa Kobran, Reva Lawry, Daniel Sadavoy and Candi Zell. $40-$15. Leah Posluns Theatre, BJCC, 4588 Bathurst St. Jan. 24 to 28. 416-616-5350

CanStage Drops Rachel Corrie: The Canadian Stage Company has removed My Name Is Rachel Corrie, the controversial play about an American woman killed by an Israeli army bulldozer in 2003, from its short list of productions being considered for its 2007-08 season.

CanStage's artistic producer Martin Bragg said the play was dropped from consideration because it was dramatically weak, not because of its political content. Bragg said he reached the decision after seeing a New York production that failed to engage the audience. "It didn't seem as powerful on the stage as it did on the page," he told Variety.

After CanStage patron Bluma Appel told a reporter she "would react very badly to a play that was offensive to Jews," Bragg was obliged to explain that he was never pressured and that "no one on our board has ever told me what we can and can't do."

Nonetheless, although My Name Is Rachel Corrie was never officially accepted into the company's upcoming season, the decision against mounting a production has sparked politicized reactions in some circles.

Internet blogs have variously reported that the play was "censored" or "cancelled" because of its potential to offend Jewish sensibilities, and because of the influence of "the Lobby," a reference to the U.S. pro-Israel political lobby group the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). Nothing could be further from the truth, of course, but people will believe what they will, and if they can insinuate a smothering Zionist presence in the wings, it conforms all the better to their perceptions of the world.

Jewish boy band a surpise alt-pop hit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

They call themselves The Lovely Feathers and they are rare birds on the alternative pop music scene: well-spoken, middle-class Jewish guys who graduated from parochial schools, grew up in the suburbs, and are sensibly preparing for more stable careers when their playing days are over.

They are lead singer/guitarists Mark Kupfert and Richard Yanofsky, bassist Noah Bernamoff, David Buzaglo on keyboard and vocals, and Ted Suss on drums. Their average age is 24, all are graduates of Herzliah High School, and most have been friends with each other since they were kids in Dollard des Ormeaux.

Kupfert, the self-effacing founder of the band, also attended a yeshiva in Israel and Yeshiva University, during a period of spiritual exploration. He graduated from McGill University in June with a minor in Jewish studies.

The Feathers are flying right now: they just came off an extensive North American tour, released their first album last April, Hind Hind Legs, on the local indie label Equator, and have been getting favourable press in publications as diverse as Spin magazine and the Jerusalem Post.

The Lovely Feathers

During 2006, they played 60 shows in clubs all over the United States and Canada, including a gig at South by Southwest in Austin, Texas, in March, the annual alternative music festival that's not to be missed by musicians hoping to get noticed by the industry.

In November and December alone, they hit Vancouver, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Boulder, Denver, Omaha, Milwaukee, Madison, Minneapolis, Detroit, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Boston and New York, driving themselves in a van. The CJN caught up with Kupfert and Bermanoff after a show at the Cabaret of the Just for Laughs Museum, and before they headed to Burlington, Vt., and Ottawa to complete the year.

The band's music defies categorization and their shows are off-beat and frenetic. Critics have made comparisons to everything from the Rolling Stones for their exuberance to The Pixies, the American band known for its melodic style.

Bernamoff describes the band's sound as "eccentric or escapist rock/pop," catchy, happy music reminiscent of the late 1970s and early 1980s' Talking Heads or Elvis Costello. "It's not like much of today's pop which is angry, aggressive, way too serious."

All five band members come with different influences and tastes, which have somehow meshed.

"We make music that moves us," said Kupfert. "There is a mystery to the creative process. My religious searching may have had an influence, even if not directly."

Bernamoff, who has been friends with Kupfert since they were toddlers, won a hockey scholarship to a U.S. college and had thoughts of turning pro. He graduated from McGill this year in philosophy and political science.

Buzaglo, the only trained musician, studied classical piano. He replaced a founding member, Daniel Suss (Ted's older brother), who was also studied piano, after he left for law school. When he's not a rock star on the road, Buzaglo sings in the choir at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and has thought of becoming a cantor. Yanofsky is now taking a break to go back to medical school. Unlike his brother, who loves Gershwin, Ted is into hard-core punk and grunge.

The band's songs are written collaboratively and usually quite spontaneously, with the guys trying out tunes until something sound right.

Bernamoff described the lyrics as often "very personal and stream of consciousness" expressions of "post-adolescent" uncertainty over meeting the expectations of adulthood. The conclusion is that whatever you do, you should be passionate about it and have fun.

One of the cuts on Hind Hind Legs is about Pope John Paul II, which Bernamoff said was a "very spontaneous reaction" to watching the outpouring of grief upon his death. "It celebrates the good things the pope did and also the negative things he represented."

There may be a few R-rated words in the band's songs, but no violence or vulgarity that parents need to shield their youngsters from, they insist. The guys look quite normal, too, although they occasionally don wacky costumes, such as superhero tights, when they perform.

The group first played under the name The Lovely Feathers, which is apropos of nothing, almost three years ago at a McGill winter bash. By the spring of that year, they were playing local venues such as Le Swimming and the Petit Cafe Campus. In March 2005, they played at Canadian Music Week in Toronto.

Things really started to pick up when they toured Canada and the United States with the more-established Toronto band Metric in late 2005, which gave them their first big exposure.

Despite being in such demand, Kupfert said they are not making any money at this point.

He said they wouldn't mind catching the attention of a major recording label and entering the mainstream market, but "we're not unhappy with our situation. It's flexible enough to allow us to follow other pursuits, like going to school."

Bernamoff said their parents are tolerant of their music careers, if somewhat bemused. "They sort of hope it's just a phase, almost a full-time hobby, we can indulge in before getting serious."

CJN Profile

'The most outstanding ambassador' in Washington

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Almost 18 years after leaving his post, Allan Gotlieb still has the unique distinction of not only having been Canada's longing serving Canadian ambassador to the United States but also the first and only Jew to have held that important diplomatic position.

Gotlieb, who turns 77 on Feb. 28, was the Canadian envoy from 1981 to 1989, when Republican presidents Ronald Reagan and George Bush reigned supreme in Washington.

By all accounts, Gotlieb acquitted himself skilfully and with aplomb. According to James Baker, the former U.S. secretary of state and the co-chair of the Iraq Study Group, Gotlieb was "the most outstanding ambassador this city has seen in a long, long while."

Last month, Gotlieb's sardonic and world-weary tinged memoirs, The Washington Diaries, was published by McClelland & Stewart.

In an interview to mark its publication, Gotlieb said that Canada's ambassador in the United States has no equal in the Canadian diplomatic corps.

As he put it, "The post of the Canadian ambassador exceeds by far in importance the role of Canadian ambassador to any other country. This is as true today as it was in my time. The reason is that from the standpoint of Canada's national interests, no country in the world is as vitally significant for us as the United States."

In his memoirs, he hammers home this point succinctly in one droll passage.

When he was introduced to Joseph Joffe, one of Germany's most influential journalists, Joffe stated the obvious when he observed: "That is a very important job. It's like being Polish ambassador to Moscow."

Pleased by the comparison, Gotlieb flippantly writes, "I congratulated him on his brilliant analogy."

Gotlieb, who as a university student dreamed of being Canada's representative in Washington, was appointed by Pierre Trudeau, then the prime minister. It was a time when Canada's bilateral relations with the United States were rather tense.

The highlight of his ambassadorship was persuading the White House and Congress to support a free trade agreement.

As he explained, "The rise of protectionism was the greatest challenge to Canada, along with the threat of pollution of our lakes from acid rain produced by coal-fired plants in the U.S. No agreement on acid rain was reached, but the momentum was created for achieving a successful accord."

Gotlieb, whose term of office was extended by Trudeau's successor, Brian Mulroney, believes that bilateral relations were much better by the time he and his wife, Sondra, left Washington.

"Mulroney placed a very high priority on forging a close relationship with the United States, whereas Trudeau was seen as critical of Reagan's anti-Soviet policies. Moreover, the Mulroney government overturned Trudeau's national energy policy, which was hugely unpopular in the U.S."

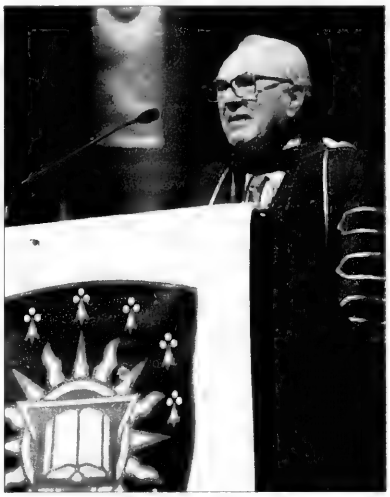
On a lighter note, Gotlieb minimizes the famous, or infamous, incident in 1986 during which his tempestuous wife slapped her social secretary at an official dinner in honour of Mulroney and the then-American vice-president, George Bush.

"Sondra, of course, greatly regretted it, but it had no impact whatsoever on the popularitry of our embassy as a meeting place for Washington's power brokers. After the incident, we stayed on in Washington for another three years and, as my diaries show, it was during this period that I experienced the height of my success and influence, as did Sondra's popularity as a leading hostess."

He was sad to leave Washington. "Both Sondra and I regretted leaving, but since I was 60, I was anxious to start a new career."

Gotlieb, who was chair of the Canada Council and publisher of Saturday Night magazine following his departure from the United States, joined the Department of Foreign Affairs in 1957 after earning degrees from the University of California, Oxford and Harvard, where he was editor of the Harvard Law Review.

The son of a Winnipeg merchant from the Jewish agricultural colony of Hirsch and of an American-born mother who served as national president of Hadassah, Gotlieb was highly successful as a civil servant.



At the fall 2005 convocation of Concordia University in Montreal, the faculty of arts and science awarded an honorary doctorate to Allan Gotlieb in recognition of his exceptional achievements as a public servant, diplomat, scholar, teacher, author and community leader.

Within a decade of setting foot in Ottawa, he was an assistant undersecretary and a legal adviser. He was subsequently deputy minister of Communications and of the then-department of manpower and immigration.

In 1977, Gotlieb was appointed undersecretary of Foreign Affairs, the first Jew in that position.

He describes it as the highlight of his civil service career. "I worked closely and directly with Trudeau for a number of years," he said.

Gotlieb, who was named an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1982, was Trudeau's personal representative at the Ottawa Economic Summit and travelled extensively with him in Africa and Latin America.

He was grateful when Mulroney offered him the chairmanship of the Canada Council. "I was always drawn to the arts and to literature," he said.

Similarly, he enjoyed being the publisher of Saturday Night, one of Canada's oldest periodicals. "I accepted it with alacrity."

A man of many parts, he is currently a senior adviser in the Toronto law office of Bennett Jones and chair of Sotheby's branch in Canada.

At Bennett Jones, he dispenses advice on a broad range of strategic issues from foreign investments to international transactions. He is also called upon to help forge relationships with business leaders, legal advisers and "practitioners in other jurisdictions."

Prior to this, he was a corporate director at Alcan and Suncor and sat on the boards of Nestle and the Carlyle Group.

"Being a corporate director and an ambassador have little in common," he said. "This made being a corporate director an appealing challenge."

As well, Gotlieb has been Canadian chair and North American vice-chair of the Trilateral Commission for the past 15 years.

Established in 1973 by private citizens from Japan, Europe, Canada and the United States, the commission encourages close co-operation between democratic industrialized countries and addresses common problems.

"It is an important organization because it brings together businessmen, political figures, scholars and experts to discuss major political and economic issues of our time," said Gotlieb.

Gotlieb, the quintessential diplomat, helps make it all happen, as he did when he was Canada's man in Washington.

A lengthy literary monument to author's 'vanished' relatives

The Lost: A Search for Six of Six Million by Daniel Mendelsohn, with photographs by Matt Mendelsohn, 512 pages, HarperCollins.

By BILL GLADSTONE

When author Daniel Mendelsohn was a boy, elderly relatives would sometimes cry at the sight of him, so great was his resemblance to his great-uncle, Shmiel Jaeger.

From some handwriting on the back of a photograph Mendelsohn knew that Shmiel and his wife, Ester, and their daughters Lorka, Frydka, Ruchele and Bronia had been "killed by the Nazis," but his beloved grandfather always skipped quickly over their photographs in his photo album without saying a word. Consequently, his ears became highly attuned to "scraps of whispers, fragments of conversations that I knew I wasn't supposed to hear."

Daniel Mendelsohn

He had heard so much about all other aspects of his American Jewish family – but who were these missing relatives?

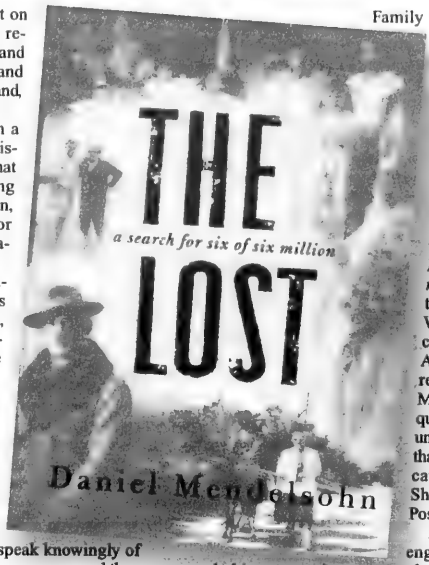
"My grandfather told me all these stories, all these things, but he never talked about his brother and sister-in-law and the four girls who, to me, seemed not so much dead as lost, vanished not only from the world but – even more terrible to me – from my grandfather's stories," he writes.

"Which is why, out of all this history, all these people, the ones I knew the least about were the six who were murdered, who had, it seemed to me then, the most stunning story of all, the one most worthy to be told. But on this subject, my loquacious grandpa remained silent, and his silence, unusual and tense, irradiated the subject of Shmiel and his family, making them unmentionable and, therefore, unknowable."

Like an astronomical black hole in a distant galaxy, Mendelsohn's silent, invisible quarry exerts an emotional gravity that ultimately overpowers him. This riveting narrative, part memoir and part meditation, is the result of his ruminative quest for knowledge and truth about his lost relatives.

Upon discovering after his grandfather's death a cache of desperate letters sent by Shmiel to his grandfather in 1939, Mendelsohn embarks in search of eyewitnesses and evidence testifying to the specific fate of his perished kin. While his genealogical odyssey compels him to visit Australia, Israel, Sweden, Denmark and other places, his first destination is Bolechow, Ukraine, the family's ancestral shtetl, where Shmiel had been a butcher.

It is in Bolechow that he first experiences those enthralling "vertiginous feelings" upon meeting strangers who speak knowingly of his lost relatives: "All that distance, all those years; and then there she was, right there across the table, there he was, chatting with me on the phone, there they were, still out there if you knew where to find them: remembering them." An impossible, gaping abyss is momentarily bridged as the seeker, wrestling with dark angels, recovers precious facts and histories from mute, unknowing eternity.



Family tree historians who utilize JewishGen and other genealogical websites will feel an instant familiarity with Mendelsohn's frequent descriptions of these amazing and powerful resources. If Jonathan Safran Foer mentioned some of them in his award-winning satirical novel Everything Is Illuminated, it was for an entirely different purpose. While Safran Foer excelled at cutting up American Jews who revisit the shtetl, Mendelsohn's sombre quest is infused with the unwritten commandment that impels many a Holocaust researcher: Thou Shalt Not Give Hitler A Posthumous Victory.

Although Mendelsohn engages in genealogical research, his purpose is not to produce an ordinary family history but rather a more noble sort of bibliographic matzevah or monument to posterity. The Lost, his literary monument in memory of his vanished relatives, may ultimately prove to be one of the most enduring such markers in our psychic cemetery.

In some ways, The Lost is a Proustian-type project in which the author weaves many personal associations from all phases of his life into the narrative, as though intent on recapturing the sights, smells, sounds, sensations of a lost time.

He also indulges in exegetical discussion of the early chapters of Bereshit, particularly those dealing with Cain and Abel, and Noach. He's especially drawn to the motif of brother killing brother, a theme reflected in the historical backdrop of the Holocaust and, on a far more subtle level, in the unspoken friction between Shmiel and Mendelsohn's grandfather, who did not answer his pleading letters and may have been forever frozen by guilt.

A classics scholar, Mendelsohn further enriches the text with allusions from ancient Greek and Latin literature. For example, noting the power of certain objects to evoke deep emotion, he offers a line from Virgil: "Sunt lacrimae rerum," which translates as "There are tears in things."

The subject being so close to his heart, he treads fertile ground and his language is particularly rich: he constructs many meaningful puns and turns of phrase. In describing Auschwitz, for example, he trades his usual sincere yearning for some of Safran Foer's biting satire. Regarding the death camp's Arbeit Macht Frei gates and other features, he observes: "All of this has been reproduced, photographed, filmed, broadcast, and published so often that by the time you go there, you find yourself looking for what it is difficult not to think of as the 'attractions,' for the displays of the artificial limbs or glasses or hair, more or less as you'd look for the newly reconstructed Apatosaurus at the Natural History Museum."

In The Lost, Mendelsohn gives expression to a sensibility that seems to infuse much of Diasporan Jewry today. My one wish is that he could have done so in a book with half as many pages. Although the subject is vast (every person is a world, after all) our precious time is finite. This excellent, moving book is weighted with a length that eventually becomes trying and ultimately dulling; the editors should have insisted on an abridgement.

Mother-daughter talks often full of tension, linguist says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Taking part in a mother-daughter conversation can be like walking through a minefield, says sociolinguist Deborah Tannen.

And Tannen, the author of You're Wearing That? Understanding Mothers and Daughters in Conversation, emphasized that she was talking about conversations between two people who love each other and are not in a troubled relationship.

Tannen was the keynote speaker at a recent Canadian Friends of Hebrew University of Jerusalem dinner honouring Barbara Bank, an activist in the Toronto Jewish community.

Bank is co-chair of the Israel and overseas committees of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada, and is also past chair of the National Jewish Campus Life committee of the Canadian Council for Jewish and Israel Advocacy.

Tannen, a professor of linguistics at Georgetown University and author of several books, including That's Not What I Meant, said the biggest complaint that daughters have about their mothers is that they are critical.

"These criticisms are often about appearance, but criticism can be a sign of caring."

Women she interviewed, said Tannen, said their mothers often make remarks about their hair, weight and clothes.

"Why are there so many comments about [these things]? Women are judged by their appearance and people often draw conclusions about a [woman] by her haircut or clothes. It is a mother's job to make sure her daughter looks the best she can."

Women frequently look at other women and think that they're doing something wrong but won't say anything.

"A mother, though, will. The women we most want to think we're perfect will remark on our flaws. It is an expression of caring," Tannen said.

"Women have reported to me that they have had their picture in the paper because of [some sort of success] and their mothers have remarked, 'You didn't cut your bangs.'"

How to raise kids is another point of contention between mothers and daughters.

"Mothers love to give advice on raising children, [but daughters are hurt] because their mothers think they're not perfect," Tannen said.

"The irony here is that the person [the mother] most wants to help is the one that least wants it. A mother's motivation to help always gets misinterpreted. What feels like criticism can be [an attempt] at helping," she added.

"A big reason that mothers and daughters have trouble talking to each other is that they are both women. Little girls talk to their best friends and tell them secrets. For little boys, activities are central. There is a more outward recognition of hierarchy among boys. They are very explicit about who is better at what."

Like little girls, "mothers and daughters talk to each other, and [the more they talk], the more chance they have of saying something wrong," Tannen said.

"Again, the irony is that your best friend is who you tell your secrets to, but when you're an adult, you won't tell your mother, and she becomes hurt. Many women are now friends with their daughters, but that presents a problem, because they are still mother and daughter," she added.

"You don't tell [some things to] your mother because you don't want to upset her. The fact that you care makes you want to keep your secrets."

Tannen said she wasn't surprised to find that every woman she interviewed talked about how they were the same or different than their mother or daughter. "They look at the other as a yardstick by which they measure themselves."

In order to reduce some of the tension, she suggested to mothers that "it might be good to bite your tongue. Offer some praise, and humour is always good. It is constructive to share laughter."

On the other hand, she advised daughters to "remind yourself that what feels like criticism is really caring."

KIDS HELP KIDS: Bialik Hebrew Day School's student council led a school-wide fundraising campaign called Children to Children to collect money for Na'amat's project to rebuild and refurbish the day-care centre in Karmiel, Israel, that was destroyed during Israel's conflict with Hezbollah this past summer. Pictured presenting a cheque for $950 to Na'amat president Sue Holzman, are, from left, student council vice-president Ariella Lenton-Brym and president Ilana Walters.

Israeli-developed Parkinson's drug approved in Canada

The first once-a-day oral treatment for Parkinson's disease –which was developed in Israel – is now available in Canada. It was approved by Health Canada in August.

Azilect, the drug's brand name, was developed at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology by former Montrealer Moussa Youdim, who earned his PhD in biochemistry at McGill University in 1966, and his colleague John Finberg. Youdim, who was born in Iran, has been a member of the Technion faculty since 1977.

"It is the fulfilment of my life's work, and I couldn't be happier," Youdim said in a videoconference with Canadian Technion Society supporters from the university's Mount Carmel campus in Haifa.

Marketed by the Israel-based Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd., Azilect is prescribed on its own in the early stages of Parkinson's or in combination with Levodopa, a standard treatment, in intermediate or advanced stages of the disease. The active ingredient in the tablet is rasagiline mesylate. The drug blocks the breakdown of dopamine, a chemical that sends information to the parts of the brain that control movement and co-ordination.

Approval was based on data from three multinational clinical studies involving more than 1,500 patients. Azilect was found to relieve the symptoms of this chronic, neurodegenerative disorder, with tolerable possible side effects. To date, Azilect has been made available in 19 countries, including the United States in July.

There are more than 100,000 Parkinson's patients in Canada.

Youdim said a large clinical study is now underway to investigate the drug's effect on slowing the progression of Parkinson's, and possibly Alzheimer's disease as well.

Visitors to Atlit Detention Camp for Illegal Immigrants get their first view of the site through a barbed wire fence. Inset: David Turovitch. [Frances Kraft photo]

Former British Mandate camp seeks testimonies

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

ATLIT, Israel – Staff members at the Atlit Detention Camp for Illegal Immigrants, the one-time British Mandate detention camp in northern Israel, are looking for former illegal immigrants to British-Mandate Palestine – or their families – who can provide personal testimony, photos and/or documents for the site's computerized database.

The site itself, which is now a museum that houses the database of 18,000 mostly Hebrew-language testimonies, provides a glimpse into Israel's history under British rule before it became the Jewish state in 1948.

It was almost torn down in the 1970s, but was saved by a protest movement and has been open to the public since 1984.

Visitors to the camp, which is a 30-minute drive from Haifa, site of Israel's largest port, get their first view of the grounds through a barbed wire fence as they walk along the path from the entrance.

On a warm, sunny day last November, Ukrainian-born David Turovitch, now a resident of Givatayim, was among the visitors, along with his family. They were marking Turovitch's 80th birthday by retracing his first steps in what was then Palestine, after he left a displaced persons camp in Germany in 1947. It was his first time back in almost six decades.

Turovitch is still trying to process his experience there, he said in Hebrew through an interpreter. "There are sad memories."

Among the 30,000 illegal immigrants who passed through Atlit between 1939 and 1948 was Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, the former chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel. He was released from Buchenwald in 1945 at age nine and went to Atlit as a child survivor of the Holocaust.

It was a "very difficult experience for him," said Atlit guide Na'ama Avital.

Although Atlit was neither a work camp nor a death camp, for the people interned there, "this was their prison," she said. Some escaped with the help of Jewish guards or the Palmach.

However, she noted, there were also weddings, dancing and singing at the camp "to keep up their spirit."

The camp's Hebrew name reflects the struggle of those who were interned there, Avital said. Machane Hamaapilim means the camp of "climbers."

Once Palestine fell under British rule in 1917, there were restrictions on Jews who wanted to make aliyah, said Avital. "You had to prove not just that you were Jewish, but that you had a certain amount of money or a useful profession, or that you were coming to study."

Among those who passed through Atlit were "masses of refugees who had nowhere else to go [after the Holocaust]." American volunteers who accompanied them on the boats also ended up at Atlit.

"It was not easy for people just out of death camps," Avital added. "Some people remember it as a horrible place," she said, adding that others don't.

Inmates' first introduction to Atlit was the building – preserved today almost as it was – where their clothes were disinfected and they had to shower.

After long journeys on crowded ships, those measures were necessary to prevent fleas and lice from spreading throughout the camp, said Avital.

Sadly, valuables such as photos and documents that were sewn into clothing were often destroyed in the steam sterilization process, she added.

At the back of the building is a full wall of oversize black-and-white photographs depicting life at the camp. Smiling faces and tender moments with young children are part of the collage.

The site also includes reconstructed barracks and a computer room with programs, available at a nominal additional fee, for children from age eight to 12, "to give them the experience of the illegal immigrant."

Tours should be arranged ahead of time, particularly if an English-speaking guide is required. To book tours or for more information, call 011-972-4-984-1980 or fax 011-972-4-984-2814.

Fichman takes big step toward pro career

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Sharon Fichman, Canada's best 16-year-old tennis player, took a major step in her development as one of the world's best juniors by making it to the semi-finals at the Orange Bowl 18s international tennis championships in early December.

The winners of previous Orange Bowl 18s include Chris Evert and Gabriela Sabatini, among other women who went on to illustrious pro careers.

Seeded third and ranked eighth in the international junior tennis rankings, Fichman was steady – if not spectacular – as she defeated four opponents before losing to No. 2 seed Ksenia Milevskaya of Belarus 6-4, 4-6, 6-0 in the semis.

Known for her ability to fight hard and bounce back in third sets, Fichman seemed to lose heart in the third set of the match.

"I should have fought harder than I did in the match. Nevertheless, I am happy with my year and feel I have matured and am a better player now than ever before," Fichman said.

Fichman should move up in the rankings when the year-end junior figures are announced.

The Torontonian registered many bright spots at the Orange Bowl tournament. Twice she trailed in third-round and quarter-final matches, but dominated in the third sets (defeating Croatian Tereza Mrdeza 3-6, 6-2, 6-4 in the third round and American Reka Zsilinska 3-6, 6-4, 6-2 in the quarters) to prevail.

In doubles, Fichman teamed with Katerina Vankova of Czechoslovakia and made it to the finals.

"Although Sharon did not have her usual fight in the semis, she has shown me that she will have a long professional career," said Sylvan Bruneau, Tennis Canada women's coach, who accompanied Fichman to the Orange Bowl championships.

"Sharon's most important quality is that she believes in herself and her footwork, prevailing in rallies. [Her] smart court sense gives her an edge over most players."

Fichman can take solace in the fact that other top stars in tennis – including Jennifer Capriati, Steffi Graf and Monica Seles – also did not win the Orange Bowl 18s.

"I feel that I would like to turn pro and become one of the top 50 players in the world one day," she said.

Sharon Fichman

Currently a Grade 11 student at Forest Hill Public School, Fichman boasts an 88 average, a feat she is as proud of as her tennis.

And her past year in tennis was very impressive, with junior grand slam doubles titles wins at the Australian and French opens, and making the finals of U.S. Open doubles – all with doubles partner Anastasia Pavlychenkova of Russia.

Fichman has had an impressive history at the Orange Bowl, finishing as a finalist in the Orange Bowl 14s at age 13 and winning the Orange Bowl 12s at age 11. She became the first Canadian to win the tournament since Carling Bassett-Seguso won the Orange Bowl 12-and-under title in 1979.

(Bassett-Seguso went on to win the Orange Bowl 18s at age 15, and after turning pro, she became Canada's best woman tennis player ever, ranking eighth in the world in 1985.)

Fichman has made history twice – as the youngest, at 14, to win the singles gold medal in tennis at the 2005 Maccabiah Games, and for being the youngest, also at 14, to compete for Canada in Fed Cup play.

Following Fichman's next tournament at the Australian Open juniors this month, Canadians will likely see her play doubles for Canada in Fed Cup play at the World Group 2 playoff on April 21 and 22 against Israel at a Canadian site yet to be announced.

It's likely that Fichman and doubles partner Stephanie Dubois will play against the Israeli team of Shahar Peer and Tzipi Obziler, but Fichman probably won't play in singles against either Peer or Anna Smashnova.

The occasion will be historic, as Fichman will likely become the first Canadian Jew to compete in Fed Cup play against Israel. (Canada last played Israel in Fed Cup play in 1972, winning 3-0.)

Barring injury, Fichman will also compete at the Rogers Cup pro women's tournament in Toronto from Aug. 11 to 17 at the Rexall Centre in Toronto.

Despite her heavy travel schedule and schoolwork, Fichman trains three hours a day with coach Ben Armstrong at the Mayfair Indoor Tennis Club in the winter and at the Toronto Lawn and Tennis Club over the summer months.

She began playing tennis at age five and has competed all over the world in junior tournaments, proving dominant on grass, clay, hard and indoor surfaces.

Fichman was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Her parents moved to Israel from Romania in 1983.

For further information on Fichman, as well as the Rogers Cup, visit www.tenniscanada.com, or call 416-665-9777.

The decoy goy

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

Every 50 years or so, they come for us. It's often a different "them," but always the same "us." If I figure loosely, I've probably got 28 years left to spend whatever I can inherit, and then pass on with a sense of a life fulfilled.

Hardly pessimistic, I consider myself enlightened in practical terms, even motivated. They've come after us in robes, then armour, and again robes – with spears, swords and guns, and we should accept that they're rigorously preparing today for the next millennial hazing – so get out more, join a gym, seize the day.

Lately, I've even grown optimistic, since witnessing the Sons of Esau buying up DVD copies of Superman Returns.

As a screenwriter by trade, I'm qualified to share with you a secret that the Seed of Israel have had in action since before Laurel met Hardy.

As Jews, we are a wandering nation, and heroes of the oldest pulp screenplay (the Bible). So how best do we fight off reoccurring villainy that successfully gouges our numbers at every turn? For this, I look to Superman, my childhood hero and favourite Jew in a cape.

Created by Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster, Jews with pencils, the story of Superman derives from the history of Moses. Both heroes represent the last sons of dying nations who as babies were wrapped in blankets, one placed in a basket among the Nile reeds, the other in a crystalline capsule that was hurled through space. Both are received as orphans, raised nobly and sent into the world to save the victims of tyranny.

What do we learn from the last son of Krypton? Which of his greatest powers informs the path we now follow for survival?

Superman's most prominent advantage was his ability to blend in as Clark Kent – the power of assimilation.

But note that assimilation proved futile for Superman many times, as it did for the Inquisition Jews of Spain and for those facing Adolf Hitler's criteria for who is a Jew – even a convert from Judaism was not spared the Nazis' wrath if he or she had a Jewish grandparent. Our conclusion is that when "they" next come, no level of cultural abandonment will conceal or protect us from 3,000 years of bagel-eating genealogy.

But we've recently taken a different aim with our great passive power of assimilation – by reversing it.

It used to be the case that anyone who was Jewish, was Jewish. If your mother was Jewish, that meant you were Jewish. Or if you were Jewish from Montreal or New York, you were Jewish.

But even if you were not Jewish, being a New Yorker now makes you Jewish. And that is the "new Jew." It's a regional identity, and the region is North America. Judaism is now available at the Gap. Judaism is a Brooklyn accent. A deli sandwich. A teen starlet in a red string bracelet talking to Madonna, who drinks Kabbalah water.

The secret implementation was this: Jewish writers, producers, performers and directors have spent the last 100 years making sure that as many North Americans as possible act, behave and eat Jewish. It's viral marketing perfectly executed. The biggest religious reverse of the year wasn't the Da Vinci Code – it was the realization that the domestic residents of this large continent are now equally considered "evil Jews" by "the nations that know Thee not."

For increasing one's survival odds, right up there with moving targets are "multiple targets." A nation of pseudo-Jews to hide within. Safety in numbers. The aim of Stage 1: creating the decoy goy.

North America is the new Israel. And satellite TV is our Torah. Champion rooftop dishes all over the world, and eventually we'll have a peaceful planet – or perhaps a globe of self-deprecation in many languages.

Wanted: a fighting force for Darfur

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

A Jewish community member approached me a year ago asking me if it was possible to establish a "peace force," a group of paid fighting soldiers who could be sent to stop the war in Sudan's Darfur region. He believed this was necessary, since neither the United Nations, NATO nor individual countries would initiate an invasion of Darfur, because it was not in their interests to do so.

China is a good example of his theory. Not only is it voting against UN resolutions to stop attacks on Darfurians by Janjaweed militiamen and government soldiers, but China has sent 4,000 soldiers to protect its oil interests, not the security of the people of Darfur.

At the time, I smiled at my friend obligingly and said his idea was unrealistic, and that diplomatic efforts would eventually bring the genocide to a halt.

That was more than one year ago. Since then, and for at least two years prior to that, millions of people around the world have rallied against the war in Darfur. More than $1 billion has been donated in humanitarian aid, and U.S. President George W. Bush is still making weekly statements about the terrible suffering of the Darfurians and the need to stop the war.

Africa nations have put together a small force, but it's ill-equipped to fight the Janjaweed.

After watching the daily suffering continue, and seeing more petitions for peace arrive in my e-mail, I have come to the same conclusion as my friend. Activism is important (if not for Darfur than for future genocides – maybe we're learning, but slowly), but it alone is not stopping the carnage in Darfur. A paid "peace force" of fighting soldiers is needed to take on the evil forces of the region who have murdered more than 400,000 people, used rape as a form of ethnic cleansing and plucked the eyes out of men who might fight back.

Consider this an offer – if only it could be done!

Men and women with fighting experience are requested to join a fighting force to finally rescue the people of Darfur. We offer you training and a salary. Conditions will be demanding, but you know that.

Please respond to Avrum with your military resume and available time to fight. There is no time to waste, so respond ASAP.

Other experienced military personnel are required (cooks, administrators, etc.). Salary commensurate with experience.

Enough is enough. It's obvious that suffering goes unanswered in our world unless there are economic reasons to respond. The question of "where was the rest of the world" while our families were dying in the Holocaust is easily answered. Busy. Uninterested. Indifferent.

My friend is right. If you read the newspapers, you know about children being macheted to death in Darfur. If you watch the news, you have seen footage of villages burned to the ground with people trapped inside the huts. If you were awake for the last three years, you'll know that what's happening today is the same thing that happened in 1940 and in the genocides in Cambodia and Rwanda: talk.

Instead of taking part in more talk, join our peace force.

People will complain. Loud voices will bellow out in the United Nations and from the mouths of evil dictators and leaders saying we are prying into the business of Darfur. They'll say that our peace force violates international law and complain about how unethical it is to use guns for hire.

More talk.

Join our peace force. The money is good, and we'll be able to say that the world did not – yet again – stand idly by. Act now!

British paper says Israel preparing Iran attack

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel denied a British newspaper report on Sunday that claimed it is planning to attack Tehran's nuclear sites using low-yield nuclear bunker busters.

Please see related stories on page 27

Iran said any such attack would provoke a reaction and "anyone who attacks will regret their actions very quickly."

According to Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Muhammad Ali Husseini, the report, published in the Sunday Times, confirmed the danger posed by Israel's possession of nuclear weapons.

"This step even comes after the Israeli prime minister's admission, which revealed the fact that the Israeli regime has nuclear weapons in its possession," Husseini said, referring to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's slip of the tongue last month, when he hinted on German television that Israel was among the world's nuclear-equipped nations.

"Now this will convince the international community that the main threat to the world, and to our region in particular, is the Zionist regime," Husseini added.

Olmert's office said it would not comment on the Times' claim. "We don't respond to publications in the Sunday Times," said Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokesperson.

Strategic affairs minister Avigdor Lieberman also declined to comment on the report, which claimed that Israel had drawn up plans to destroy Iran's uranium enrichment facilities with tactical nuclear weapons.

But foreign ministry spokesperson Mark Regev denied the report and said, "The focus of the Israeli activity today is to give full support to diplomatic actions and the expeditious and full implementation of [UN] Security Council Resolution 1737 [which last month imposed sanctions on Iran for failing to halt uranium enrichment]. If diplomacy succeeds, the problem [of Iran's nuclear drive] can be solved peaceably."

According to the British report,

Students urge return of Eli Cohen's remains

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Jewish student organization with branches in 50 countries is joining an international effort to press Syria to release the remains of arch-spy Eli Cohen.

The effort is being spearheaded by the Cohen family, including Eli's brother, Maurice, who was implored by his late mother, Sofie, to make every effort to bring her son's body back to Israel for a proper Jewish burial.

When he spoke to The CJN in May 2006, Maurice Cohen felt that, despite humanitarian appeals to the Syrian leadership and diplomatic back-channel contacts, he had failed to keep his promise to his mother.

He will not see his dream come true. He died last month while taking a nap. However, Eli's widow, Nadia, continues the effort and she addressed the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) on the issue, at its recent conference in Be'er Sheva.

Eli Cohen

WUJS agreed at the convention to call on Syrian President Bashar Assad to return Cohen's bones to his family in Israel. WUJS plans to circulate a letter petition to its members and then to forward the petition to Assad through high level diplomatic channels. The letter notes Assad's recent statements suggesting he intends to renew peace negotiations with Israel, and proposes that the president make a humanitarian gesture by returning Cohen's remains.

"We are convinced that such an act could open the way to the hearts of many people and lead to a meaningful peace process between Syria and Israel, which will eventually bring stability to the entire region," the letter states.

WUJS chair Daniel Translateur, whose signature is on the letter, said Nadia Cohen addressed 180 student delegates at the WUJS conference and called for a good faith effort from Assad to show his peace overture was serious.

"As Jewish students, we felt it was an important issue, not just for Israel, but for the Jewish world," Translateur, a native of Colombia, said.

Peace with Syria would help defuse tensions in the north, particularly after last summer's war with Hezbollah, and the Cohen case "is one of the the most heartbreaking issues," he said.

Melissa Lantsman, president of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), attended the Be'er Sheva meetings along with seven other Canadian student representatives – the largest Canadian delegation

Tribute to Kollek

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) paid tribute to former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, who died recently at age 95. Noting Israel had lost one of its legendary founding fathers, CIC national chair Moshe Ronen said, "As mayor of Jerusalem for almost three decades, from 1965 to 1993, Kollek oversaw the city's revitalization and modernization following its historic reunification under Israeli sovereignty during the June 1967 Six Day War. Kollek both recognized that Jerusalem is the eternal capital of the Jewish people and, in accordance with Jewish values, promoted co-existence amongst the diverse faith and cultural communities of the City of Peace."

Maccabees Hit Ice

TORONTO — The Maccabees, a Jewish women's hockey team, finished tied for fourth in a six-team women's tournament sponsored by the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League. The Maccabees, which includes members of the Israeli national women's team, won one game, lost two and tied one. It was the first time the team participated in a competitive tournament. The Ojibwe Northern Storm finished first, edging out second-place European Sirens.

World

Restoring the Call

BARCELONA— Barcelona is restoring its old Jewish quarter 600 years after anti-Jewish riots killed many Jews and forced a large number to leave or convert. It is renovating 21 buildings in the Jewish quarter, known as the Call, and creating an interpretive centre. In the Middle Ages, Barcelona's Jewish community of 4,000 played an integral role in the city and served as a bridge to immigrants from throughout the Mediterranean.

Airline Heroism

MOSCOW — A flight attendant aboard a Russian airliner that crashed last July 9 on landing at an airport in the Siberian city of Irkutsk was honoured as Person of the Year 5766 by Russia's largest Jewish group, the Chabad-led Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia. Viktoria Zilberstein risked her life to rescue others by opening the emergency hatch in the back of the plane. Her heroics allowed 10 people to escape; 124 perished. The 15th annual awards ceremony also recognized the contributions of Russian Jews in politics, culture and community.

(Jewish) Roots Reggae

NEW YORK — Chassidic singer Matisyahu had the No. 2 reggae album in 2006. Billboard reported that the New Yorker sold the second-most reggae albums with Live at Stubb's, behind Sean Paul's The Trinity. Matisyahu also ranked second and third in the Billboard reggae singles chart with King without a Crown and Youth, behind Sean Paul's Temperature.

Military Precedent

WASHINGTON — A former U.S. chief of staff cited Israel's experience in allowing gays to openly join the military. Gen. John Shalikashvili, who served as chief of staff under former U.S. president Bill Clinton when the "don't ask, don't tell" policy was introduced, said it was time to move on to the next phase: open acceptance of gays in the military. Shalikashvili cited Israel, Britain and other allies as having militaries that have successfully integrated gays. He noted their presence would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces.

Guidebook Sells Out

LONDON — A new book documenting sites of Jewish interest in England has sold out its first printing. Jewish Heritage in England: An Architectural Guide was published last month to coincide with the 350th anniversary of Jewish resettlement in England. The guidebook sold thousands of copies in its first month and publishers have ordered a second print run.

Suit Targets Holocaust Deniers

PRAGUE — The Forum of Jewish Organizations in Antwerp has filed suit against participants in a recent Holocaust-denial conference in Tehran.

The Belgian lawsuit includes anyone who gave a speech questioning the Holocaust at the conference sponsored last month by the Iranian Foreign Ministry. Holocaust denial is illegal in Belgium and is punishable by up to one year in jail and a $3,000 (US) fine.

The purpose of the lawsuit is to cause legal problems for attendees who might want to visit Belgium, according to a forum source. The rabbinate in Antwerp issued a declaration against conference participants and urged that the few Jewish attendees of the conference – mostly members of the fringe Neturei Karta group – be banned from Antwerp synagogues.

New standards possible for Orthodox conversions

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Orthodox rabbinate in Toronto has put conversions on hold as it ponders whether to change the standards required of those wishing to join the Jewish fold.

The beit din, the rabbinical court that approves conversions, will likely not determine its course of action until the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), an umbrella organization that represents 1,000 rabbis, makes its own determination, said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary to the Toronto beit din. The beit din, he said, "is not bound by everything the RCA decides, but it certainly wants to be consistent with it."

At the heart of the issue is the desire by many in the Orthodox community to set a single universal standard for conversion that would be accepted by rabbis the world over. Currently, the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel has set a more stringent standard, while rabbinical courts elsewhere have set less strict requirements. The result has been an unwillingness by some communities to recognize as valid conversions by others. Some Jews, turned away by one court because of a refusal to agree to strict lifestyle requirements, have gone elsewhere to find a more lenient court, Tradburks stated.

The changes, should they come, would have the greatest impact on families seeking to convert adopted children, he acknowledged. The beit din converts between 20 and 25 such children each year, as well as a further 20 to 25 adults (past bar mitzvah age).

The last child conversion under the old standards took place before the summer.

Under those criteria, parents were required to agree to send their child to a Jewish day school, keep kosher and maintain a sense of the Shabbat and other Jewish holidays.

Now being considered are the additional requirements that the families be Sabbath observant and follow all mitzvot commandments, including prayer and wearing tfillin every day.

Rabbi Tradburks, who is responsible for intake and management of conversions for the beit din, said Israel has been applying the more stringent standards and North American batei din are considering conforming to them. To date, however, the beit din in Toronto has been following a "more lenient" line.

"Even though that's been the standard, there's been a certain degree of discomfort with that…To be frank, the reason this more demanding standard has not been used was rachmonis [sympathy]," prompted by the realization that families seeking to convert youngsters had already experienced the pain of infertility and the difficulties of adoption. "You have good people who have gone through a lot," Rabbi Tradburks said.

Part of the discussion now underway in Toronto is what to do when families already have one child converted under the old standard and wish to convert another child. Also being considered is protecting the status of previous conversions.

Though no final decision has been made on earlier conversions, "I don't believe there

Worth knowing

From the editor's desk

Back in the 1960s and '70s, it was a nearly unshakable article of the social protester's faith that "information was power."

Information and knowledge were the idealists' key instruments. When combined with commitment and courage, they were the barging bulldozers that moved public opinion, if not always policy mountains.

To be sure, the protesters of yesteryear are older, and perhaps less able to protest now, even if they are so inclined. But if the axiom regarding information was true four decades ago, it should be no less true today. The causes of 2007 are no less important than the causes of 1967.

It is in this spirit, therefore, that I impart the following disparate pieces of information, in the hope that readers who are already staunchly determined protesters on behalf of the Jewish state's right to live in security and peace, will find empowerment too.

The World Jewish Congress has recently begun publishing a weekly bulletin whose sole focus is monitoring events in Iran.

Titled WJC: Iran Update, the document provides the public with the latest news, information and commentary concerning the troubling developments in Iran. The four-page bulletin usually divides its information according to the following sections: Latest Developments, Inside Iran, Must Reads, A Look Ahead, and Community Update.

In the editorial that appeared on the front page of the most recent issue, WJC president Edgar Bronfman summarized the purpose of Iran Update.

"The WJC hopes that Iran Update will contribute to the information you need to participate vigorously in the global debate about this critical topic."

Whether he intended to or not, Bronfman was retransmitting the formerly faint but increasingly stronger echoes of earlier times regarding the enabling power of information.

Anyone may subscribe to Iran Update directly by going to the sign-up page of the website: www.worldjewishcongress. org/news_subscription.html.

Fair-minded, decent individuals who oppose the oppression of the weak by the strong cannot help but respond viscerally when they hear the term "apartheid."

Israel's enemies know this, understand this and exploit this. Therefore, over the years, they have assiduously planted and cultivated the apartheid accusation against the Jewish state. Indeed, it is one of the vilest accusations made against Israel and especially stinging because it has no basis in truth or fact.

Alas, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, is now one of the chief propagators of the Israel-apartheid lie. Though he purports to use "apartheid" only in relation to Israel and the Palestinians of the territories, he is as disingenuous in this disclaimer as he is withal where Israel is concerned.

That is why it is important to know and to praise Kenneth W. Stein, professor of contemporary Middle Eastern history, political science and Israeli studies and director of the Middle East Research Program and Emory Institute for the Study of Modern Israel at Emory University in Atlanta, for his decision to try to set straight a historical, political and diplomatic record that the former U.S. president has deliberately distorted and so perversely twisted.

Stein is writing at least six to 10 weekly articles that will "address major omissions, errors, exaggerations, and inventions" in Carter's recently released book Palestinian Peace Not Apartheid.

In a courageous and highly principled act, Stein last month resigned his position as Middle East fellow of the Carter Center at Emory University, to protest the former president's blatant misstatement of the truth.

In his letter of resignation, Stein was direct and to the point about Carter's publication: "President Carter's book on the Middle East, a title too inflammatory to even print… is replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions and simply invented segments. Aside from the one-sided nature of the book, meant to provoke, there are recollections cited from meetings where I was the third person in the room, and my notes of those meetings show little similarity to points claimed in the book."

The offence to Stein's conscience in the publication of the Carter book was severe. "My continued association with the centre leaves the impression that I am sanctioning a series of egregious errors and polemical conclusions which appeared in President Carter's book. I cannot allow that impression to stand." He thus ended a 23-year association with the centre that he actually helped establish. Space permitting, The CJN will try to run those articles.

For further information on the upcoming series of articles by Stein, readers may contact his assistant Heather Waters. Her e-mail address is: heather.f.waters@emory.edu Her telephone number is 404-727-2798.

We are not as powerless as we often feel we are in the campaign to defend Israel. Information – and the truth that flows therefrom – is one of the sources of our power.

Parents 'need to be partners' in educating kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The central challenge of Jewish education revolves around the question, "Why is it meaningful to be a Jew?" according to a Toronto-born expert on Jewish education.

"Numbers aren't the only thing that concern me," said Daniel Marom, referring to an emphasis on enrolment statistics among Jewish education professionals.

Daniel Marom

The director of the Visions of Jewish Education project at the Jerusalem-based Mandel Foundation and co-editor of the 2003 book Visions of Jewish Education works with Jewish educators in Israel and North America to help them fine-tune their educational "visions" and translate them into practice.

"What happens once you get into the school is more important than the enrolment," Marom told The CJN in an interview last week, a day before speaking at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

The issue of enrolment was among those addressed in The Way Forward, the federation's report on Jewish day school education released here last summer.

Among other recommendations, the report advocated a test loan program for tuition, a $100-million education endowment fund and a study to examine the idea of creating a community-wide middle school.

Marom – a 48-year-old graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), York University (where he was part of the first cohort of the Jewish education program) and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he received his MA and his PhD – believes the Toronto education report is important.

"It's nice to see energy for Jewish education," he said. "It's nice to see that [the authors] don't limit Jewish education to day schools. They see the big picture: kindergartens, summer camps and Israel trips. It's also nice to see Jews of different backgrounds collaborating for the betterment of the community."

However, he added, "the language of the report is still about strategic planning," and the report itself takes "a client-oriented approach."

But Marom believes that parents "can't agree to be part of this client-service provider relationship. They have got to be partners. They've got to see this as an opportunity for their growth as Jews."

Drawing on his own experience as a former student at Associated Hebrew Schools and CHAT, Marom, who made aliyah 24 years ago, said that his father, Sydney Himel (Marom is a Hebrew translation of the name), "approached the system, not as a consumer, but as a partner and contributor." Himel embarked on his own Jewish journey and volunteered as a basketball coach at CHAT, despite the demands of a busy law practice.

Marom said parents should ask themselves first not where they will send their children to school but " 'What kind of Jew do I want to be?' You need to share something that you yourself believe in."

Because their parents – Toronto-born, public school-educated Himel and his ex-wife Malka Marom, an Israeli who sang as part of the duo Malka and Joso in the 1960s – were from different backgrounds, Marom and his brother, journalist Martin Himel, were exposed from an early age to different approaches to Judaism.

"It was a privilege and enriching," Marom said.

For children's early years, he believes it's important to give an unambivalent message, but "if we stay there, it becomes a snow job."

Israel, for example, is often presented as "some kind of Hollywood happy ending to being a Jew," he said. He suggests a more complex, relevant approach that acknowledges Israel's "warts" and approaches it as "a project that needs your contribution."

If a community middle school, such as the one proposed in the federation report, is to work, "it can't just be a receptacle," Marom said. "You have to use the plurality in a positive way."

He remembers debating fellow students in the school washroom about issues like whether to keep kosher, or to live in Israel. "Why didn't they bring [those discussions] into the classroom?" he asks now.

Marom said he hopes the idea of a community middle school derives from the question of how to "enable learners to come out of our educational programming feeling engaged and privileged forever to be part of Jewish life," not from the question of how to maximize day school enrolment.

"I'm going to say something difficult," he cautioned earlier in the interview, broaching the subject of the relative weight given to Holocaust education in the Jewish system.

If surviving the Holocaust and making sure it doesn't happen again are presented as the sole, or main, reasons for being Jewish, Marom fears that "the vision of such a Jewish life might be problematic," a fear he said is shared by some Holocaust educators he's spoken to.

What is sometimes missing or overshadowed, he suggested, is an emphasis on why it's meaningful in a positive way – not based on fear or guilt – to be Jewish in the modern world.

Although he has been publicly critical of aspects of his own Jewish day school education, Marom said he was fortunate to have been given glimpses into the richness Judaism has to offer. It was enough to "lasso" him for the rest of his life, he said.

York professor named president of AJS

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Sara Horowitz, the director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies was recently given an additional title.

Last month, Horowitz became the fourth female president – three of whom have been Canadian – in the 38-year history of the Association for Jewish Studies, based in New York.

"It is what's called a learned society. It's a society composed of academics, professors of Jewish studies in a wide range of disciplines – Jewish history, Jewish literature, rabbinics, Talmud, Bible, Jewish sociology – a whole range of fields that contribute to what we call Jewish studies," said Horowitz, who is also a regular CJN columnist.

"The main activity of the organization is an annual conference, which roughly 80 to 85 per cent of the membership attends. At the [three-day] conference, the members present their ongoing research to their peers. It's a way of getting feedback from your peers on what you're working on."

The association boasts a membership of about 1,500 teachers, researchers and graduate students whose focus is on Jewish studies.

Sara Horowitz

Horowitz was appointed to her three-year term as president by the board of directors, which is comprised of 24 members representing universities across North America as well as Israeli universities.

"It is a real honour to be recognized in that way by my colleagues. I'm very appreciative of their confidence in me to move the organization ahead. It is a real responsibility to shepherd the organization," Horowitz said.

She has been involved with AJS since she was a graduate student more than 20 years ago, and until December, she was the vice-president in charge of programs. In other words, she had the task of organizing the annual conference.

She said one of the things she worked on was to bring the subject of technology to the conference, the way it affects their teaching and research methods.

Horowitz also deserves much of the credit for bringing the conference to Canadian soil for the first time in the association's 38-year history.

Next December, the AJS conference will be held in Toronto.

As president, Horowitz said, she expects "to give a vision to the organization as a whole and to look to see whether we can take on new initiatives that would benefit our membership… but also [make us] able to be a service in taking the fruits of people's research in Jewish studies and bringing them to a wider audience."

One of the initiatives Horowitz hopes to implement is to make connections with Jewish studies professors in central and eastern Europe who lack the resources that professors in North America may take for granted.

"Their libraries are very lean, they don't have the kinds of materials that they would need, they are mostly strapped financially, and it is very hard for the professors… to travel very far," Horowitz said.

"[We] give travel grants to eastern European and central European Jewish studies professors to bring them to the conference each year so they can meet their colleagues and learn about the work other people are doing and share their work."

Although the association's main purpose it to promote and improve Jewish studies programs, it also serves as a resource for people seeking information for a book or a movie.

"People can call us if they are looking for speakers on a particular issue. We really have within our membership an array of scholars and speakers, and the people who write the books that people learn from are written by our members."

While the association continues to grow and expand its scope, Horowitz said there are still areas that could use improvement, and during her term, she hopes to address those issues.

"I think we have not been strong on sessions on pedagogy, on Jewish education. I think we'd like to strengthen what we do at the conference in those areas. We'd like to interact with local communities when the conference is in a different place each year. We have begun to interact more with the local Jewish communities, who in large part, are actually interested in the sessions. We can also work with teachers in Jewish day schools," she said.

A revealing tale of two governments

The government of Israel is being hectored by various foreign policy experts to re-open diplomatic discussions with Syria. Just last month, for example, British journalist Patrick Seale urged that the latest Syrian "overtures" toward Israel be taken seriously. Seale was the biographer of the late Syrian president Hafez Assad and is known to have excellent connections to the current Syrian ruler, Hafez's son, Bashar Assad.

Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem told the Washington Post last month that his government is willing to hold talks with Israel without any preconditions. Bashar had left such talks dangling with former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, who, it was reported, had been willing to make far-reaching concessions to secure a full peace agreement with the Damascus regime.

The government of Israel, though, is not convinced that the recent purported peace overtures are sincere. Nor does it wish to reward the Syrian strongman for his antagonistic, anti-Israel behaviour.

Damascus was deeply involved with Iran on the side of Hezbollah during the war last summer, and it also hosts the headquarters of Hamas and a cadre of other extremist Palestinian terrorist groups. Damascus' attitude toward the Jewish state and toward the fostering of peace in the region is clearly and manifestly hostile.

Syria is also anti-humanitarian in the extreme. Time and again, Bashar has callously refused to surrender the remains of Eli Cohen for burial in Israel. As The CJN reports today, Israelis are continuing to pressure Bashar to release Cohen's bones to the Cohen family, and they are right to do so. They are also correct in asking, more than rhetorically, what kind of person Bashar is and what kind of regime he runs.

In contrast to the enigmatically cruel regime in Syria, however, is the enigmatic but pragmatic regime in Amman, with whom Israel signed a peace accord in 1994. Though the peace is more between governments than it is between peoples, it does still demonstrate the benefit that can flow to the citizens of the area.

An incident last week shows how.

Israel's Foreign Ministry reported that it was able to help facilitate the rescue of 47 Israeli Arabs from a precarious situation in Saudi Arabia. The 47 were returning to Israel from the Haj pilgrimage when their bus broke down in the heat and sand of the Saudi Arabian desert.

Their rescue followed a quick chain of events in which the government of Amman played a key role that could be sung like a song from the Passover seder. One of the travellers called the tour operator in Israel; the tour operator called the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem; the Foreign Ministry called the Israeli embassy in Amman; the embassy secured the assistance of someone at the Jordanian royal palace; the Jordanians quickly called the Saudi royal palace in Riyadh; the Saudi royals then arranged for the rescue of the Israeli pilgrims from the desert.

Damascus and Amman: a tale of two very different governments.

Israel and Syria lashed at each other as the United Nations Security Council debate on the Golan Heights continued into its second week.

As the Israelis and Syrians traded insults, the United States sought to tone down a Syrian plan to force political, economic and military sanctions against Israel.

Golan part of historic Land of Israel

I applaud Frances Kraft's article on the Golan Heights ("One of the safest places in Israel," CJN, Nov. 23). As an Israeli who enjoys exploring the Golan as often as possible, I urge your readers to make the Heights a "must-see" on their next visit to Israel.

There are, however, a couple of points I would like to add. The claim of the State of Israel and the Jewish people to the Golan Heights predates the period 1947 to 1967, when Syria controlled this strategic area and used it as a base for aggression against northern Israel. The Golan is in fact part of the historic Land of Israel, notwithstanding that its degree of sanctity in a religious sense does not approach that of Jerusalem. Moreover, the Golan was included as part of the British Mandate over Palestine to which the Balfour Declaration applied.

It is unfortunately a widespread misconception that Syria's claim to the Golan predates Israel's and that the return of the Golan Heights is the only basis upon which peace with Syria can be obtained. Let us also not forget that in 1981, when Menachem Begin was prime minister, the Knesset officially annexed the Golan Heights to the State of Israel, as well as united Jerusalem.

Golan key to Israel's survival

To give the Golan Heights to Syria is nothing short of insane. There is nothing Syria can give Israel in return, nothing at all. Even less than the zero we got from Egypt through the peace agreement of 1979. Right now Egypt is actually moving further into the negative as it is allowing arms smuggling into Gaza. The Golan is key to our survival. As a nation, we cannot afford to capitulate anymore.

The world needs more Cotlers

Irwin Cotler, member of Parliament and former minister of justice and attorney general, continues to show that he is a man of courage, compassion and integrity and one who is guided by the talmudic principle, "Justice, justice, you shall pursue." In his latest public writings, Cotler has not only mounted another vicious and well-deserved attack against Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, but he also draws our attention to the plight of Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury, a Bangladeshi national who is on trial and faces the possibility of execution for trumped-up charges, while having been denied almost every single basic fundamental right that has been recognized in international law ("Bangladeshi suffers for advocating Israel ties," CJN, Jan. 4).

In alerting Canadians to Choudhury's case, Cotler continues to defend his international clients not only in the courts, but also in the "court of public opinion." This, as he has shown in the past in defending clients such as Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky, is often more important than the actual legal defence in court, as it often embarrasses a rogue country into action and reminds those of us in the democratized world of the importance of continuing to fight for the rights of the oppressed and the vulnerable.

In continuing his attacks against Iran's hateful, anti-Semitic leader, Cotler is cognizant of the old saying that if history is forgotten, it will repeat itself. If the world continues to sit by and allow Ahmadinejad and others to call for the destruction of an entire country and to deny that the Nazi Holocaust occurred, then history may very well repeat itself.

The world needs more Irwin Cotlers.

Engaging the intermarried

I would like to applaud the Conservative movement for continuing to take steps to be more welcoming to interfaith families ("Schechter schools may revise admissions policy," CJN, Toronto, Jan. 4; "Schechter schools consider more flexibility for non-halachically Jewish students", CJN, Montreal, Jan. 4). When Rabbi Jerome Epstein announced his plans for a movement-wide initiative to engage the intermarried last year, it wasn't clear what the practical consequences would be. But his impassioned plea to day schools to "make a special effort to enroll the children of intermarried Jews even if they are not halachically Jewish" shows that he is backing up his words with action.

Too often, people in the Jewish community talk about outreach (efforts to engage the intermarried) and "in-reach" (efforts to engage born Jews and socialize them with other Jews) as if they are mutually exclusive projects. But if Conservative day schools admit the children of non-Jewish mothers, they will be performing outreach and in-reach at the same time. Admitting the children of interfaith families into Jewish day schools is a win-win for the Jewish community and the intermarried.

Kollek remembered as builder of Jerusalem

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

Teddy Kollek, the longtime Jerusalem mayor who died last week at the age of 95, is being remembered as the most prolific builder of the city since King Herod.

The man who transformed the Israeli capital in 28 years from a dusty backwater to an international city of parks, theatres and museums died Tuesday in the city that was his home and great love.

"He was the man who created the name Jerusalem as a real place, not as a town where things were blown up, but a place where people could live together, even as Arabs and Jews," said Yisrael Kimche, who worked under Kollek as the director of policy planning for the city and is currently a researcher at the Jerusalem Institute of Israel Studies.

"He established modern Jerusalem more than anyone else," Kimche said.

Kollek, who grew up in Vienna and came to what was then British Mandate Palestine in 1935 as a young man, was considered one of the last of the generation of Israel's founding fathers. He was known for expertly navigating the divide between Jerusalem's diverse populations – Jewish and Arab, religious and secular.

He had been in office for just two years when the Six Day War broke out in 1967, leading to the reunification of the city.

"Jerusalem's people of differing faiths, cultures and aspirations must find peaceful ways to live together other than by drawing a line in the sand," Kollek once said.

Kollek forged strong ties with American Jewish and other Diaspora leaders throughout his tenure and was adept at raising funds for his beloved city.

Former New York City Mayor Ed Koch called Kollek, his longtime friend, "the mayor of all mayors."

"Everybody loved him, including everyone in the city of Jerusalem, even when they disagreed with him, and that ran the gamut from the Jews to the Arabs to anyone," Koch told JTA.

In 1991, just after the first Gulf War started, Israel's Ministry of Tourism asked Koch to visit Jerusalem to help show that the city was safe and to boost the sagging tourist industry.

Kollek, who was notorious for walking the streets of Jerusalem without security, even during dangerous times, was assigned to take Koch to the Western Wall.

Koch recalled a flurry of stones being thrown at their entourage, then realizing he had been hit and his head was bleeding profusely. The cut would eventually need nine stitches.

"I said to Teddy, 'This stone was meant for you,'" Koch recalled, chuckling at the irony that while he came to show that Jerusalem was safe, photographs of his bloody head appeared in newspapers around the world.

"He replied, 'Oh no, that stone was for you. Everybody loves me. And if you had a head of hair like mine, you wouldn't have felt it.'"

Koch also said Kollek was instrumental in helping Israel forge diplomatic relations with the Vatican. He introduced Cardinal John O'Connor to Kollek via telephone, and shortly afterward, the cardinal visited Jerusalem, paving the way for other Church officials to follow suit.

He did his best to establish and secure harmonious, inter-communal and inter-faith relations.

Theodor Kollek was born in 1911 in a small town in Hungary and moved to Vienna as a young child.

There he became active in Zionist youth movements under the influence of his father, a staunch Zionist who named his son after Theodor Herzl.

During the Israeli War of Independence in 1947 and 1948, Kollek helped buy weapons and ammunition for Israel's fledgling militia, the Haganah. He also met with Adolf Eichmann soon after World War II broke out and persuaded him to allow 3,000 Jewish youths passage to England.

Kollek became a confidante of David Ben-Gurion and worked as the chief aide to the country's first prime minister from 1952 to 1965.

In 1965, Ben-Gurion asked Kollek to run for mayor of Jerusalem as part of his political party. Kollek initially balked, believing he had no chance to win. Much to his own surprise, he was elected.

He was defeated 28 years later in 1993 by a Likud party leader named Ehud Olmert.

Once the traditionally Arab eastern area of Jerusalem became part of the city in 1967, Kollek set ambitious plans to build Jewish neighbourhoods around it to keep the city Israeli. He also worked to bring municipal services to the Arabs, who, under Jordanian rule, had lived in some neighbourhoods without sewage, running water or telephones.

But the city's Arab population often said they felt neglected, even by the man championed for his vision of a mosaic city. Palestinians comprise about one-third of the city's 700,000 residents.

Former aides and Kollek himself would say in later years that not enough money and support was channelled to neighbourhoods in the eastern sector, which have consistently received less funding than Jewish areas in the west. Kollek did, however, protest moves by Jewish right-wing groups to settle in areas of eastern Jerusalem, claiming such moves were provocations in an already tense city.

With Kirk Douglas promoting Jerusalem

Kollek was known for his relentless pace and his efforts to build up the city. Virtually every cultural institution in the city came as a result of his influence and fundraising, from the Israel Museum and the Biblical Zoo to the Jerusalem Theatre. He transformed large swaths of land into parks with tulip beds, walkways and promenades to take in the city's famous views.

"The city is definitely mourning his loss," the president of Hadassah International, Marlene Post, told JTA from Jerusalem. "He was greater than life. You can definitely say that he was a modern-day Herod. He built the Knesset building, the Jerusalem Museum and Hebrew University on Mount Scopus."

Hadassah built a hospital on Mount Scopus in the eastern part of Jerusalem in 1939, she said. It was captured by the Jordanians in 1948 and was in a state of disrepair when Israel recaptured the mountain with the rest of the eastern part of the city in 1967. Eight years later Kollek returned to Hadassah the keys to the hospital, which, with 400 beds, is the second largest of Hadassah's centres in Jerusalem.

"He looked at us as the people who treated the people of Jerusalem," said Post, who was in the Holy Land with birthright israel, of which Hadassah is a sponsor.

Kollek also cultivated archeological projects and led reconstruction efforts in the Old City's Jewish Quarter.

The fiery mayor was often at his City Hall office at dawn and would be the last to leave 16 hours later. He had his own key to the front gate and would let himself in and out.

Kollek is also being praised for adeptly juggling the needs of the city's Jewish population – secular and religious.

He approved the building of neighbourhoods for haredi Jews far from the main roads so that they would not be affected by people driving on Shabbat. He also fought for a sports stadium, which won the praise of secular Jerusalemites. To quell religious protests, he promised a nearby shopping mall would remain closed on Shabbat.

Today's Jerusalem, Kimche said, feels like a more extreme place. The successive Palestinian uprisings have polarized Jewish and Arab populations, and the growing size and strength of the haredim have led to confrontations over religious pluralism.

Kimche said he mourns the Jerusalem that his former boss was trying to create – an open, tolerant and cosmopolitan city.

How Teddy put the city back together again

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post

With shells beginning to explode in downtown Jerusalem in the opening hour of the Six Day War, I ducked into the one nearby doorway that was open. A plaque in the lobby revealed that this was City Hall. I told the doorman I was an American journalist and asked if I could see the mayor. The doorman called upstairs and told me to take the elevator to the top floor.

"What's his name?" I asked.

"Teddy Kollek."

Kollek, in office just a year and a half, stood in his doorway and beckoned me inside. He spoke with candour about what was happening. Two aides came in and we stood at a window watching dirty plumes of shell smoke hang in the air before disintegrating. It seemed that the city was being blown apart.

It would be my privilege in the coming years to watch Kollek put the city back together again, making it larger, more beautiful and far more complex, during the decade that I covered the Jerusalem municipal beat for the Jerusalem Post.

It was Kollek's ebullient personality and grand vision that made this the most fascinating journalistic beat I could imagine. He had the capacity to envision the dim backwater that was pre-1967 Jerusalem as a radiant city on the hill – the city on the hill – and he had the drive, the managerial capacity and the charm to make it happen.

The fact that an outspoken liberal like Kollek was elected six times by one of the most right-wing electorates in Israel showed that the city's Sephardi majority understood that this Ashkenazi prince was real, that he cared, that he was neither self-serving nor cynical. He was a Viennese cosmopolitan who loved a good brandy, a good cigar and good company, but he had never lost the sense of duty that brought him to Palestine as a pioneer.

Every morning at 6:30 he would tour neighbourhoods with his driver, Nahum, and make notes on potholes, missing street signs, bald spots crying out for greenery. His notes would be on a secretary's desk an hour later to be forwarded to respective department heads. Woe unto him who did not remedy the problem within days.

About once a year, Kollek would smack a citizen he felt was being abusive, usually someone far younger than he was. None of them ever complained.

Teddy was blessed with a self-confidence that put the mighty and the humble at ease. He also had a temper that not infrequently left secretaries in tears, but he would make amends with a note or a box of candy. He had a marvellous sense of fun – posing in a fireman's helmet or other colorful headgear, gamely hanging on to the back seat of a policeman's scooter, joining a soccer game wearing shorts that threatened to slide off. But he also had an incomparable ability to find the right thing to say at the most solemn or embarrassing of public moments.

Teddy was Jerusalem's father figure. We were fortunate that he was with us as long as he was.

Abraham Rabinovich is a former Jerusalem affairs correspondent for the Jerusalem Post.

Opinions

Israel beyond conflict

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Purging Israel from the landscape of the Middle East has long been a rallying cry for Arab dictators of one stripe or another. And all too recently, the demented ramblings of Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and similarly toxic rhetoric from leaders of Hamas, Hezbollah, and others of their ilk have brought a new seriousness to the existential threat that Israelis have had to cope with for generations.

As usual, a mostly complacent international community and, in particular, a morally paralyzed Europe, have done little to defang Islamist terrorism or deter the nuclear aspirations of the Iranian regime. The consequences of such inaction must be obvious, but obvious also were the mortal dangers that faced Israel in its wars of 1948, 1967 and 1973 – when a majority of world powers ignored the plight of the young state.

But ideologies and politics aside, it's difficult to understand why there has been so little international recognition of the preciousness of Israel as an incubator of ideas and innovations that have uniquely contributed to modernity and enhanced the quality of life of so many around the globe. Without Israeli ingenuity, how much longer might it have taken for cellphones, mobile computer chips and instant messaging to have reached the level of sophistication that we now take for granted? How much longer might it have taken before a capsule-sized video camera would become an alternative to traditional endoscopy for visualizing the gastrointestinal tract? How much longer might it have taken for drip irrigation and cutting edge technology in desalination, desert reclamation and crop modification to have developed so remarkably?

Israeli know-how has been credited with all of these and so much more. There is hardly a sector of industry, or medicine, or science that has not been touched by discoveries in Israeli laboratories.

With the world's 36th largest economy, Israel has been rated among the five fastest growing emerging markets in the past 20 years. Not bad for a country that has less than a thousandth of the world's population.

What is also underappreciated is Israel's enormous impact in the arts, music and literature, its unwavering commitment to international humanitarian and relief efforts, and its preoccupation with civic process and the rule of law.

There are obvious incongruities and much ignorance and hypocrisy in the way that most nations view Israel. By constantly focusing on Israel in conflict or, even worse, as an alleged cause of conflict, it's easy to denigrate, or at least ignore, the positive and creative influence that Israel has had on the way we live. To conceptualize Israel beyond conflict, as a partner and respected participant in making the world a better place, has been shown to be considerably more difficult. More is the pity that this is so.

Living in Jerusalem with wisdom

Teddy Kollek, Jerusalem's former mayor, died on Jan. 2. He wrote this essay for the Jerusalem Post on Aug. 9, 1998.

Teddy Kollek

Jerusalem is the focus of political, religious, cultural and social tensions – not just internally, but between ourselves and the Palestinians and the Arab nation and between ourselves and the world at large, including our American friends. This calls for a balanced and responsible policy for the capital, unlike the concept adopted today.

I know that in the face of terrorist attacks, hostile decisions taken by international forums and harsh declarations emanating from the Arab world, it is difficult to practise patience and forbearance, which are often interpreted as a sign of weakness. But it is precisely the honesty and the cool-headed logic of responsible action that will strengthen our historical rights to the city and its status as Israel's capital. Provocative or impulsive actions will not serve our interests.

For the Palestinian leadership and the Arabs of Jerusalem who represent close to 30 per cent of the city's population, Israeli rule is that of the occupier. Since 1967, the Arabs of Jerusalem have avoided taking an active role in city administration, for fear their participation would be interpreted as an acceptance on their part of the new geopolitical reality and of Israeli sovereignty.

Immediately following the reunification of the city, I invited the 10 Arab members who had served on the city council under Jordanian rule to join a new united city council. My invitation was rejected.

From my experience of many years as mayor of Jerusalem, I know that many of Jerusalem's Arabs were convinced that the stance they took harmed their own sector.

Their absence from city representation contributed to the present difficulties of the Arab sector as regards social and economic development and the municipal services they receive. This situation is also the consequence of the uneven policy followed by Israeli governments, both right and left.

Pressure policy intended to harm, to limit, or to edge Jerusalem Arabs outside the capital's borders is not only morally and humanly unjustifiable – its implications also place it in opposition to both national and local interests.

In fact, none of the mistaken approaches to this topic has shrunk the dimensions of the Arab population. Pressure and constant threat have added a strong national motive to the natural growth of the Arab population.

The damage caused by Israeli settlement within distinctly Arab areas is the most serious. It is perceived by the city's Arab population as a threat to their existence, it arouses hatred and bitterness, strengthens extremist factions and causes the international community to distrust us.

Existence in this problem-ridden city calls for living side by side in mutual respect. The invasion of small extremist groups goes against all logic. In a city like Jerusalem, activity such as this adds fuel to the flames.

It would befit us all to be angry at the fact that thanks to vast sums of money – and at the instigation of wealthy men whose own homes are far away – there exists a process that is at odds with responsible policy, one that forces the state into massive expense and politically impossible situations and turns the city into a maze of tensions. If this money were invested sensibly, housing for hundreds of young couples in Jerusalem could be constructed.

My knowledge of the process underway in the Arab sector convinces me that there exists a strong desire, just as there does among the Jews, to take steps to improve the quality of life and the environment. This was the motive that led me to establish local community administrations throughout the city, including in east Jerusalem. Such local administration prevents the gap between establishment and citizen.

The knowledge and experience garnered by the leaders of the communities in promoting their daily interests –whether in the Jewish or in the Arab sectors – will also contribute to the calming of political tensions. Throughout the 30 years that have passed since Jerusalem was reunited, the city has developed in impressive fashion, reflecting the Israeli consensus that united Jerusalem, under Israeli sovereignty, is the capital of Israel. I believe that this fact is irreversible – so long as we behave wisely.

Owing to this fact, we are able – and even obliged – to deal with the everyday needs of the Arab population in a much more enlightened and fair manner. While Jerusalem is the capital of Israel, it needs to be at the same time home to both Israelis and Palestinians.

Israel – reasons for optimism

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Israeli newspapers and talk shows are full of doom and gloom predictions – Iranian nuclear weapons, America in retreat, Islamic terror radiating from the remains of Iraq, a triumphant Hezbollah gaining more power in Lebanon, Syrian resurgence, Palestinian defiance and more. And Israel is in the midst of leadership crisis, without anyone to present a clear direction or vision of better times.

But while many of these maladies are all too real, Israel's overall condition and the prognosis for the future are far more positive. Not withstanding the bungled Lebanon War that failed to produce a clear victory, Hezbollah's ability to act as Iran's agent in attacks against Israel has been reduced significantly.

In Iran, the genocidal declarations of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad continue, but in parallel, students in Tehran are bold and angry enough to burn pictures of him while he speaks. Local elections resulted in a major defeat for his policies and supporters – another sign of slippage. And, after months of hesitation, the UN Security Council, including China and Russia, finally adopted sanctions aimed at convincing Iran to give up its nuclear weapons efforts. None of these developments, on their own, are likely to prevent the production of enough fissile material to make nuclear bombs, but these steps provide a foundation for hope that more decisive action may be forthcoming.

At the same time, there is reason to hope that the erosion of America's influence in the region has slowed, and perhaps is being reversed. The execution of Saddam Hussein is an opportunity to declare a new approach to Iraq, and replace the attempt to create democracy with the more realistic goal of containing terror. Serious Republicans and Democrats agree on the need for a basic change in policy that will restore the deterrence image of the United States.

Closer to Israel's borders, the Palestinian terror organizations are in retreat, using much of their firepower to attack each other. They have not been defeated, but they are also keeping a much lower profile than in the previous year. And despite the power of political correctness and the myth of Palestinian victimization, the outside world is showing some recognition of the dilemmas that Israel faces. In the year since the triumph of Hamas in the Palestinian elections, the international criteria for direct aid have not been watered down. Palestinians are not ready for statehood and a stable peace with Israel, but they are becoming more realistic.

Looking at Israel from the inside, a serious effort has already begun to correct failures exposed during the Lebanon War. Budgetary priorities and resource allocations are being changed within the military, and there is a clear determination not to allow a similar outcome in any future engagement. In this and other areas, Israelis, as a society, show far more strength than our current leaders. The revulsion at recent evidence of high-level corruption and the Lebanon experience have together brought forward a group of young people who do not view public service as a get-rich-quick scheme.

The Israeli economy continues to be a huge surprise, far exceeding even optimistic forecasts, and with no significant impact from the Lebanon War. The high-tech growth has expanded during 2006, providing even more jobs and exports than had been expected. This is one dimension in which the absence of government intervention has proven to be a blessing.

Internally, the division of these fruits remains problematic, and the Lebanon War diverted attention from the goals of increased social equality and reduction in poverty that are long overdue. But the core Jewish values that highlight feeding the hungry, caring for the sick and providing education have resurfaced and are again at the top of the agenda. Private donations and volunteer groups have come to the forefront of this process, providing assistance where the government has dropped the ball. Here again, the younger generation of Israelis is providing the necessary leadership.

None of this should leave us complacent – the challenges that Israel faces, both from within and outside, remain formidable. But instead of wallowing in the gloom and doom, there are good reasons to expect and prepare for a more optimistic future.

Bush struggles to devise a new strategy in Iraq

A month after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group grimly described the situation in Iraq as "grave and deteriorating," U.S. President George W. Bush is scheduled to announce a new and hopefully more effective strategy to stabilize that strife-torn nation

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Bush, who remains convinced that victory is still achievable despite his admission that the war is not being won, is expected to present his new plan this week. In all probability, he will send yet more troops to Iraq to augment the current force of 140,000, even though most Americans have lost faith in the war and say it is no longer worth fighting.

His objectives are three-fold: to tamp down the escalating sectarian violence in Baghdad that pits Shiite Muslims against Sunni Muslims; to deal with the red-hot insurgency in Anbar province; to strengthen the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which ordered the execution of former Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein on Dec. 30 and whose very legitimacy is pointedly questioned by the Sunni minority.

A lot is riding on Bush's decision: his place in history, the role of the United States in the Middle East, Iraq's future as a viable state, and the impact it may have on Israel.

Bush's new secretary of defence, Robert Gates, who replaced the architect of the war, the discredited Donald Rumsfeld, broadly laid out the stakes in a recent speech. As he put it, "Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility and endanger Americans for decades to come."

The reassessment of U.S. strategy comes at a pivotal moment, when Iraq is being compared to Vietnam. American combat deaths in Iraq have reached the 3,000 mark, and there has been a dramatic upsurge of sectarian violence since last February, when a major Shiite mosque in the town of Samarra was bombed by Sunnis. Even the Pentagon admits that the insurgents – mainly a mix of disaffected Sunnis and Islamic fundamentalists – have been spectacularly successful. They have perfected the dark art of ethnic cleansing, virtually pitched Iraq into civil war and pushed it toward the still unimaginable spectre of partition.

Some observers think that the partitioning of Iraq into sovereign Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish states would be a beneficial and long overdue development, since Iraq is essentially an artificial state, its borders having been arbitrarily drawn by the British after World War I. But the Bush administration opposes partition, at least for now, and is assiduously working for a unified Iraq where Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds can coexist.

Given the utter mayhem in Iraq, the United States certainly has a better appreciation of the iron grip Saddam exerted on his countrymen from the day he assumed full power in 1979 to the day he was toppled in the 2003 allied invasion. Saddam was a tyrant who oppressed his people ruthlessly, squandered the lives of tens of thousands of soldiers in two futile wars and exposed Iraq to biting United Nations sanctions. But as he calmly went to the gallows to the jeers and taunts of his Shiite executioners, cursing so-called traitors and spies, the United States and Iran, he was also remembered as a strongman who kept Iraq together as a nation.

In spite of all their efforts to transform Iraq into "a beacon of democracy," the Americans have abysmally failed to bring a modicum of security to that misbegotten nation. Once a fairly advanced and powerful Arab nation, Iraq is falling apart at the seams as suicide bombings wreak daily havoc and as never-ending sectarian killings displace legions of Iraqis and prompt the flight of millions of its citizens abroad. By any yardstick, Iraq is faltering badly, and the Americans have been unable to stem the tide.

The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, proposed a "new way forward" to head off total disaster. The commission basically recommended that U.S. forces in Iraq be redeployed in an advisory and training capacity so that the reconstituted Iraqi army can take over primary responsibility for combat operations by the first quarter of 2008.

Although the panel argued that sustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental causes of domestic violence, they added the caveat that the temporary infusion of American soldiers into highly localized areas might limit violence. They warned, however, that sectarian warfare would flare up again with the departure of U.S. forces.

In another recommendation, they urged Bush to launch a new diplomatic offensive to build "an international consensus for stability" in Iraq and the region. Iran would stem the flow of arms to Iraq, respect Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity and use its influence over Iraqi Shiite groups to encourage national reconciliation. Syria would staunch "the flow of funding, insurgents and terrorists in and out of Iraq."

The Iraq Study Group also called for "a renewed and sustained" effort by the United States to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict through a two-state solution and an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. It warned that Washington would not be able to achieve its goals in the Middle East unless these issues are directly addressed.

To the Iraq Study Group's frustration, Bush has reportedly decided to ignore its chief recommendations and chart his own course.

He and his advisers seem to be of the opinion that a significant surge of U.S. troops into Iraq will help stabilize the situation. But top American generals in Iraq, from John Abizaid to George Casey Jr., already have made it clear that such a move would increase Iraqi dependency on the United States and solve nothing in the long run. Colin Powell, the commander of U.S. forces during the 1991 Gulf War and the former secretary of state, concurs with their position.

The Democratic party, which seized control of Congress in 2006 and regards last November's midterm elections as a referendum of the war's unpopularity and untenability, rejects troop increases and calls for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

As for involving Syria and Iran, Bush is willing to engage them, but only if they abide by certain conditions.

Iran will have to stop enriching uranium for its nuclear program, while Syria will have to prevent foreign insurgents from using its territory to enter Iraq, cease interfering in Lebanon's affairs and halt all support for Hamas and Hezbollah.

Syria wants to be part of the process so as to ease its international isolation and improve its relationship with Washington. But Iran has adopted a harder line, saying it will not cooperate unless the United States commits itself to a withdrawal from Iraq and stops campaigning against its nuclear program.

The Democrats are not so dogmatic, believing that Syria and Iran can be included in the process of bringing stability to Iraq without imposing prior conditions on them. Last month, in defiance of the Bush administration, three Democratic senators, including former presidential hopeful John Kerry, went to Damascus to sound out President Bashir al-Assad on the possibility of engaging Syria in the stabilization of Iraq

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel disagrees with the notion that the turmoil in Iraq is connected with the Arab-Israeli dispute. But in deference to Bush, he has rebuffed what appear to be sincere Syrian peace overtures.

At the end of the day, Israel will surely be affected by events in Iraq.

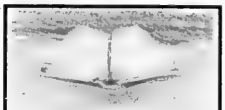
In search of the four missing persons

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH



Rabbinic Reflections

What appears at the outset in Bereshit to be a plot of brotherly rivalry and jealousy becomes, in the final analysis, the pathway to saving a nation from famine and fulfilling its ultimate destiny to experience a great deliverance and become the "People of the Book."

In Parshat Vayigash, we are told that after revealing his identity to his brothers, Joseph reassures them that they need not be distressed for their crime of having sold him to the Egyptians.

Joseph tells his brothers that their action was, in fact, God's design to rescue them from destitution: "Do not reproach yourselves for having sold me here, for it was as a supporter of life that God sent me ahead of you," he says in Bereshit 45:5.

And the entire purpose of this rescue and survival was to bring about a great deliverance. Henceforth, Joseph invites them to live with him in Egypt, Pharaoh being pleased to have Joseph's entire family live in the land of Goshen, a city rich in pasture for their livestock.

The parshah describes the journey: Jacob arose from Be'er Sheva. The sons of Israel transported Jacob their father and their young children and their wives… They took their livestock and their possessions… and they came to Egypt – Jacob and all his offspring with him. His sons and the sons of his sons with him. His daughters and the daughters of his sons and all his offspring he brought with him to Egypt.

The direct descendants of Jacob who came with him to Egypt totalled 66, we learn in Bereshit 46:26. Jacob and his sons' wives are not included in this census.

We are told that the 66 souls also excluded Joseph's sons who were born in Egypt: "Asenath, the adopted daughter of Potipherah, the priest of On, bore Joseph two sons – Menasheh and Ephraim."

The statement is repeated later in the parshah, but this time with a variant total of the number of persons: "Joseph's sons were born to him in Egypt – two souls. All the souls of Jacob's household who came to Egypt were 70."

How do we account for four additional souls?

We read that Jacob took all his children and grandchildren with him. So why was Dinah not mentioned? Let's examine Verse 10: Simeon's sons – Jemuel and Jamin… and Shaul, the son of the Canaanite woman.

Who is this Canaanite woman and why is her son Shaul mentioned in the same line as the sons of Simeon? In the midrash, we find an insight that sheds light on this. The midrash speaks of a specific Canaanite woman, and Rashi identifies this woman as Dinah.

When Simeon and Levy killed Schechem, Dinah's captor, Dinah did not wish to leave. As a consolation, Simeon swore to marry her and thus keep her within the family heritage.

Two missing persons are now identified – Dinah and her son Shaul. Dinah was counted amongst the 70 because she had the status of being a daughter of Jacob.

Dinah also had a daughter with Schechem, named Asenath, who is identified as the third missing person. The sons of Jacob wanted to kill the child. But the angel Michael brought her to the house of Potipherah in Egypt. Potipherah's wife, who was barren, raised her like her daughter. Later Asenath married Joseph.

According to the midrash, the 70th descendant of Jacob to come to Egypt was Yochebed, Moses' mother, who was born "ben hachomot" (between the walls), before entering Egypt.

Despite the difference in numbers, the midrash relates that the entire family was called one nefesh, one soul, because they were of one spiritual mindset and would together fulfil their ultimate destiny.

Torah study can be daunting

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Although it is being rethought in some circles, the routine and curricula in haredi schools around the world remains fairly uniform, dominated by many hours of talmudic analysis. Though Torah study obviously can be a source of great joy, the day is very long and the challenge is daunting, especially for those students less intellectually and temperamentally inclined to such a demanding regimen.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

A fascinating perspective on this situation can be gleaned from the educational thoughts of Rabbi Eliyahu Eliezer Dessler, as recorded in the third part of his collected correspondence and essays, titled Michtav Me-Eliyahu. In 1952, Rabbi Dessler was asked about the possibility of opening a haredi seminary for male teachers whose likely alternative in lieu of such an institution would be to study in college. In response, he vehemently attacks any philosophy of education that would attempt to combine Torah learning with secular study, deriding this worldview as the "Frankfurt approach," a reference to the legacy of the 19th-century leader of German neo-Orthodoxy, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch. Rabbi Dessler contrasts the Frankfurt approach with those yeshivot in eastern Europe that circumscribed and even banned secular study in order to fully engage their students in the world of Torah learning.

Rabbi Dessler is remarkably clear-eyed about the implications of this uncompromising attitude in terms of its effect on many children, as he writes: "The method of yeshivot is to uphold one singular objective – to develop people who are both Gedolei Torah [giants in Torah scholarship] and Yir'ei Shamayim [God-fearing people]. Towards this [end], they [presumably Gedolim in eastern Europe] forbade university to their disciples, because they did not see any way of raising Gedolei Torah unless they directed their students' focus exclusively to the study of Torah. However, do not think that they did not know from the outset that this path, God forbid, would ruin some [students], since they could not withstand this extreme, and would thus separate from the way of Torah. But this is the price that must be paid in order to produce Gedolei Torah [my translation]."

Whether defection from the halachic system can be traced to the sentiment expressed in Rabbi's Dessler's letter is hard to say, because abandonment of Torah observance is a complex and multi-determined phenomenon. But it is crucial that students who are not cut out for intense Torah study not be made to feel that they are somehow lesser, and that their God-given abilities and talents be recognized and cherished.

On an ideological level, the issue of secular study, or even the question of altering the curriculum to allow for more concentrating on the philosophy and mission of Judaism, needs to be discussed and taken far more seriously than it is at present. Many students are Orthodox without knowing what that really means or how to articulate the Torah's vision of the world. As Rabbi Daniel Mechanic, the director of Project Chazon, points out in Faranak Margolese's recent work Off the Derech: "We are producing generations of kids who went to yeshiva for at least 12 years, yet, in many cases, remain totally unprepared and unable to explain to themselves and others why they are Torah observant."

And that, surely, is a price we can no longer afford to pay.

Friendship – a many-sided thing

Friendship: An Exposé by Joseph Epstein, Houghton Mifflin Company.

Books
Bernard Baskin

There are numerous Hebrew words meaning "friend," and each illustrates a different aspect of the dynamic process of friendship. One Hebrew word for friend, "chaver," derives from the root "to link oneself to, to be joined to." Another word is "rea," defined in the Bible as "one who is close to you, almost like your very self." Another Hebrew term meaning friend is "yadid." Yadid can be related to two other words: "yad," meaning "hand" and "dod" meaning "loved one." The process of being a friend involves reaching out, extending a hand to another in affection and love.

Friendship, as the following quotations suggest, is a slippery, quirky, many-sided thing.

• If we were given by magic the power to read each other's thoughts, I suppose the first effect would be to dissolve all friendships. – Bertrand Russell

• If all men knew what each said of the other, there would not be four friends in the world. – Blaise Pascal (1623-1662)

• Never exaggerate your faults; your friends will attend to that. – Robert C. Edwards

• Love thy neighbour as thyself, but choose your neighbourhood – Louise Beal

• Chance makes our parents, but choice makes our friends. – Jacques Delille

• Love demands infinitely less than friendship – George Jean Nathan

Two extreme examples of friendship in the Bible are found in the story of David and Jonathan and the story of Ruth and Naomi. In both instances, one of the friends (Jonathan and Ruth) is ready to sacrifice everything out of loyalty to the bond of friendship. The friendship described is between persons of the same sex. No doubt this is because close friendships between men and women were exceedingly rare, on the grounds of sexual morality, so that friendship between a man and a woman was often expressed in marriage.

The process of being a friend requires of us to take the risks of self-disclosure. As the Talmud puts it, "When there is worry in your heart, you should tell it to others." Not only does talking it out help you, but it also draws another into the process of friendship—bringing him/her close to you, allowing him/her to help, to feel needed.

Loyalty, inherent in friendship, instructs us to stand up for a friend. Rabbi Eliezer asserted, "Let the honour of your friend be as dear to you as your own." Jewish law would have it that if you have something to say on a friend's behalf, you are forbidden to withhold it.

All of the previous observations flow from a reading of Joseph Epstein's graceful and diverting new book.

He writes that William F. Buckley Jr. once gave a party to which he invited – what he called – his 1,500 closest friends. The author believes that 75 friends is about the proper number, if one thinks of them as people with whom one has had past relationships and expects to have continuing relationships, with all of the conviviality and obligations entailed in a friendship.

I wonder who has 75 close friends? Henry Adams was probably closer to the truth when he wrote, "One friend in a lifetime is much, two are many, three are hardly possible."

Often Epstein feels that the burden of friendship is too heavy and onerous. Maybe it is high time, he suggests, for Hallmark to come out with a card that reads on the cover, "We've been friends for a long time," and continuing on the inside with the words, "What do you say we stop?" After all, as some cynic suggested, "There are three kinds of friends – best friends, guest friends and pest friends."

In any case, the bemused reader is left at the end with George Santayana's assurance: "One's friends are that part of the human race with which one can be human."

Kugel lore and recipes – Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Can one food be a symbol of religious devotion and national pride, and even demonstrate kabbalistic powers? Those qualities and more have been attributed to a kugel, a traditional pudding or casserole enjoyed on Shabbat.

Since food cannot be cooked on Shabbat, kugel is prepared before sunset Friday and can be kept in a warm oven until Saturday afternoon. [http://tinyurl.com/yxaqal] "The first kugels were made from bread and flour and were savoury rather than sweet," states Wikipedia. "About 800 years ago, their flavour and popularity improved when cooks in Germany replaced bread mixtures with noodles or farfel. Eventually eggs were incorporated… In the 17th century, sugar was introduced, giving home cooks the option of serving kugel as a sweet side dish or dessert." [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kugel]

The variations are practically endless. The Jewish-food KUGEL Archives offers incredible 231 mouth-watering variations including: Apple Challah, Salt and Pepper, Hungarian, Fish, Cheddar Cheese and Chocolate Chip. I also appreciate the truth-in-advertising recipe titled Incredibly Fattening Noodle Kugel. [http://tinyurl.com/wkfvm]

And if you still haven't had your fill, the Jewish Food Mailing List Archives provides recipes in three categories: savoury (129 recipes), sweet (77) and Passover (89). [http://tinyurl.com/yery3m]

Despite all the variations, there is one type of kugel that seems to have more than its fair share of devotees, the Kugel Yerushalmi or Jerusalem Kugel. Food writer Giora Shimoni explains its history and appeal. "This uniquely flavoured savoury kugel of caramelized noodles spiced with black pepper was brought to the city of Jerusalem by eastern European chassidic Jews in the 18th century… Kugel Yerushalmi is traditionally eaten after Sabbath morning prayer services – either for kiddish or lunch – along with cholent and pickles." [http://tinyurl.com/utvcz]

During the summer of 2002, when Jerusalem was reeling from terrorist attacks, the city decided to hit back – by holding a four-day outdoor food festival. Along with the record 66-foot-long challah, the Israel Chefs' Association created a gigantic Jerusalem kugel. The ingredients: 220 pounds of noodles, 600 eggs, 110 pounds of sugar, 55 pounds of raisins and a gallon of olive oil. Cooking instructions: bake slowly for five hours. [http://tinyurl.com/yn2532]

Speaking of Jerusalem, even the most casual visitors to the city's Meah She'arim neighbourhood are familiar with posters warning the community to abstain from television, the Internet or some other vice. Well, the Life in Israel blog has reprinted a Hebrew poster (with accompanying translation) that warns of the spiritual dangers posed by serving Jerusalem Kugel on Shabbat. Reason No. 5: "The penetrating odour of the kugel wafts into the shul and can be a distraction during davening and cause people to lose focus on their prayers." The sign is signed by "those who feel the pain of Yerushalayim, the committee regarding Kugel Yerushalmi." That's when it dawns on you that the poster is actually poking fun at all those other posters. [http://tinyurl.com/yx94jn]

The Jewish people are credited for giving the world many gifts such as ethical monotheism. But Jewish contributions don't stop there. Although it's not actually a Jewish invention, who knows if the common bundt pan would ever have become a household fixture if not for the Jewish pudding? In 1966, a group of women from a Minneapolis Hadassah chapter wanted to enter a kugel in a Pillsbury Bake-Off contest. The women explained their pan requirements to the Minnesota-based Nordic Ware company and the bundt pan was born. The kugel won and the popularity of the pan soared. [www.slphistory.org/history/nordicware.asp]

Any food with roots as deep as kugel's is sure to raise the passion of devotees. However, I know of another kugel debate that rages from time to time throughout the Jewish community. While most people know the food as "kugel," I, however, grew up lovingly referring to it as "kigel," thanks to my family's Polish-Yiddish pronunciation. Jules Levin knows of the debate and recalls a Solomonic compromise that is sure to bring piece to warring factions: "In our house vi call it 'pudjing.'" [http://tinyurl.com/y5v2yg]

Beth Emeth's choir director retires after 30 years

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

After 30 years leading one of the nation's most esteemed synagogue choirs, maestro Charles Heller is retiring.

The veteran director of Toronto's Beth Emeth Synagogue choir leaves a formidable legacy at the synagogue and big shoes to fill.

"The next director is very fortunate to be coming to a shul choir with a strong reputation," says Heller.

"My advice is to maintain that high standard, both of repertoire and performance."

Originally from England, Heller began his music education early in life, playing the piano and singing in a local synagogue choir.

"I joined a shul choir in London when I was eight," he says.

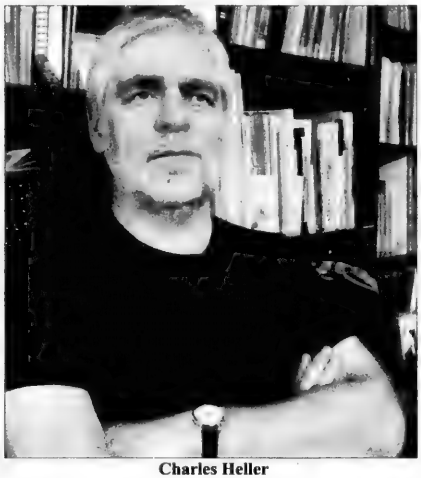
"I liked it and I could really understand what music was all about. It just made sense to me."

Heller graduated from Cambridge University and pursued a dual career as a teacher and part-time choir director.

Seeking out better opportunities for both of his passions, he arrived in Canada, briefly settling in Kitchener, Ont., before connecting with Beth Emeth.

While under Heller's direction, the Beth Emeth choir grew and evolved significantly, gaining a stellar reputation not only in Jewish circles but also in the larger community.

For instance, the choir, which has included a diverse membership over the years, ranging from boys under the age of 10 up to seniors, performed on television and sang the Canadian and American national anthems at several Toronto Blue Jays baseball games.



Charles Heller

"It sounded out of this world at the Skydome," Heller recalls of the anthem singing.

The choir also drew praise outside of Canada while singing in Miami.

"When we sang in Miami, it was standing room only in the shul," Heller relates.

In addition to directing the choir and cantor at Sabbath and holiday services, Heller also composed music.

A particular highlight in this regard was in 1984, when he composed music sung by Beth Emeth's former cantor, Louis Danto, before Queen Elizabeth in front of thousands of listeners at Maple Leaf Gardens.

"It was very rewarding to have the opportunity to compose music for Cantor Danto," Heller notes, adding that he and Danto had a close working relationship. "It gave me an opportunity to be creative."

Although directing the synagogue choir required intense hours of rehearsing, composing and performing, Heller has simultaneously juggled these duties with leading another choir, the Zemer Chorale, being a consultant editor for the Cantors Assembly of New York, as well as a day job as a teacher, which he continues to do.

Recently, Heller parlayed his vast knowledge and insight into a book titled What to Listen for in Jewish Music.

The book explores the distinctive features of Jewish music, including its origins, how it is taught and learned, its influence on church and western art music, as well as the role it plays in society.

"Over the years, so many people have asked me questions about Jewish music," Heller says.

"I hope that by reading the book, a lot of these questions will be answered."

The book is available at local Jewish book stores. For more information, visit www.ecanthuspress.com.

Mideast media coverage changed direction in '06

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

If there's one thing that characterized the media's coverage of the Middle East in the past year, it was the attention paid to the region as a whole, as compared with the nearly obsessive attention it has frequently paid to Israel.

Stories about Canada's military operations in Afghanistan understandably led the Canadian media's foreign coverage. Reports of Iran's race to develop nuclear weapons were not far behind. Running alongside these were item after item about Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's crazed hatred of Jews and his repeated threats to "wipe Israel off the map." Then, there were endless reports about ceaseless suicide bombings in Iraq and other reports of torment and chaos there.

Also high on the agenda were stories from Lebanon about Hezbollah's efforts, backed by Iran and Syria, to unseat the government of Fuad Saniora; and Syria's attempts to thwart the UN investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Still, last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah, and the conflict in Gaza between Israel and Hamas, did focus huge attention on Israel – much of it unfairly critical.

Over the past couple of months, the media have paid considerable attention to the discord and fighting between Hamas and Fatah in the Palestinian Authority (PA). However, with some exceptions, they have not drawn Israel into the story, nor blamed Israel for the problems plaguing inter-Palestinian politics and society.

In "Iran gives new global muscle a workout" (Toronto Star, Dec. 30), Olivia Ward opens with these words: "Iraq bleeds. Sudan suffers. But for sheer headline power as 2006 draws to a close, Iran is the country of the year. From its nuclear defiance to its Holocaust-denying conference, it has gained new notoriety in the West, while spreading its influence throughout the Middle East and Asia, creating both fears and friends. Meanwhile, record oil prices have sent profits gushing to Tehran."

Ward provides a brief survey of Iran's growing influence in the region – in Lebanon where it supports and directs Hezbollah, in the PA-areas where it funds Hamas, and in Iraq where it backs the Shiite militias. Ward then turns to what is arguably the principal concern among the Sunni-dominated Arab states, especially the Gulf states led by Saudi Arabia – non-Arab, Shiite Iran's growing power, influence and even threat to their own stability.

Ward quotes Sheikh Musabin Abdulaziz, editor of the Saudi magazine Al Salafi: "Iran has become more dangerous than Israel itself. The Iranian revolution has come to renew the Persian presence in the region. This is the real clash of civilizations."

Despite limited UN-imposed sanctions, Iran's determination to acquire nuclear weapons is as unsettling to Saudi Arabia (which made an unprecedented move last summer by initially supporting Israel against Hezbollah) as it is to Israel.

Whether Ward is right (based on her reading of Ray Takeyh's book, Hidden Iran: Paradox and Power in the Islamic Republic) that Iran's belligerency may be tempered by other forces in the country pushing for realism and pragmatism, remains to be seen.

Former U.S. President Jimmy Carter

Former U.S. President Jimmy Carter's book, Palestine: Peace or Apartheid, continues to receive not only uncritical praise in some circles but also trenchant criticism in other circles. For instance, the highly influential Economist magazine, in its Dec. 13 issue, called Carter's book "weak… simplistic, and one-sided [against Israel]."

In the Dec. 26 Wall Street Journal, Israeli historian Michael Oren, well-known author of the Six Days of War and author of the just released Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, dealt head-on with what he called the appearance of Carter's "religious problem with the Jewish state." Oren wrote: "[Carter's] book bewails the fact that Israel is not the reincarnation of ancient Judea but a modern, largely temporal democracy…

"Whether in its secular and/or observant manifestations, Israel clearly discomfits Mr. Carter, a man who, even as president, considered himself in 'full-time Christian service.' Yet, in revealing his unease with the ideas of Jewish statehood, Mr. Carter sets himself apart from many U.S. presidents before and after him, as well from nearly 400 years of American Christian thought…, [which] embraced the concept of renewed Jewish sovereignty in Palestine."

Artist raises money for Israeli charity

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Sometimes the smallest part of a journey makes the biggest impact.

When Toronto artist and fashion designer Clare Nisker travelled to Israel last summer as part of Canada Israel Experience's Taglit birthright trip, that's exactly what happened.

Over the course of her 10-day, whirlwind tour in June 2006, Nisker saw historical sights, visited landmarks, had a bat mitzvah on Masada and volunteered for a few hours at Yad Eliezer, Israel's largest charity food bank.

The last activity lasted just a few hours but made an enduring impression that resonated with her deep sense of spirituality and Jewishness. So much so, that upon her return to Canada, Nisker was determined to help Israel's poor and undernourished the best way she knew how: through her love of painting.

Nisker, 26, set up Project Tribute, a personal endeavour to raise money for Yad Eliezer.

She painted two pictures, and then produced a limited run of 118 signed prints, at her own cost, to be sold for $118 each. The prints were created using a giclée process, which gives them the look and feel of original paintings.

One hundred per cent of the money goes to Yad Eliezer.

"I wanted to give back to the people of Israel and help their country thrive… to ensure future generations have a state to call their own," she said.

She spent two months painting the poignant watercolour portraits based on iconic Israeli imagery.

The first, titled Tribute, depicts two rabbis praying solemnly at the Kotel. The second, Prayer for Peace, shows three Israel Defence Forces soldiers, their backs towards the viewer, huddled together at the Kotel (Western Wall) in prayer.

"They're sacrificing their lives for us," Nisker said, fighting back tears. "I get so emotional when I think about it. I chose this picture because you can't see [the soldiers'] faces. It could be you standing there. We should know how lucky we are because of them."

The whole experience profoundly changed her outlook on life.

Nisker commented that she always considered herself a spiritual person. But before the birthright trip she, like many of her peers busy with their workaday lives, lost track of what was important and was very self-involved, she said.

She gained perspective into both the beauty and the hardship of life in Israel while on the trip.

"My connection now to Israel… just getting off the plane, the smell, the atmosphere… it's in my heart," she said.

The newfound relationship with the country stoked her desire to alleviate the suffering of its citizens and inspire others to do likewise.

"I was in shock when I found out that one in seven Israeli families use Yad Eliezer's food bank," Nisker wrote on her website. "On the trip, I realized how many people are struggling financially."

In addition to raising money for Israel's needy, Nisker hopes Project Tribute will help her peers maintain a connection with Israel as well.

"There were a lot of young Jews on the birthright trips who had the same reaction as me," Nisker said. "Now they're back here and living their lives and buying condos, but they also want to celebrate Judaism. That's why I made these prints. So they could put them in their houses and be proud."

According to its mission statement, Yad Eliezer's goal is to ensure that every Israeli lives a life of dignity, self-reliance and self-respect.

The charity, founded in 1980, serves more than 12,000 families yearly and relies on volunteerism and donations from charitable individuals to cover its minimal overhead costs.

To date, Nisker has sold only 15 prints, but she is confident that the imagery combined with the cause will translate into more sales in the Jewish community.

She's in constant contact with Yad Eliezer's U.S. and Canadian representatives, who have expressed great appreciation for her efforts.

Everyone who purchases a print receives an annual report from Yad Eliezer, a tax receipt and a personalized letter from Nisker, thanking them for their generous donation.

Nisker will keep the prints on sale as long as it takes to sell them all.

"The paintings are meant to be in someone's office or home," she said. "They're a piece of my heart that goes out there. I feel good that I can give someone the inspiration that I got. God willing, I will start another project soon."

Orthodox conversions on hold

will be changes for child conversions that have already been done," Rabbi Tradburks said.

He acknowledged that tightening the criteria for conversion could push some parents to other streams of Judaism, such as Conservative and Reform, with the implication that those children will not be universally considered Jewish. Certain Orthodox day schools would likely not admit such students, though the mainstream community day schools likely would, he suggested.

One Toronto rabbi, who wished to remain anonymous, said the proposed changes are "another manifestation of Toronto Orthodoxy making an extreme right turn. This movement to the right is not in keeping with the concept of ahavat Yisrael (love of the Jewish people) which we should try to promote.

"This will drive many people away from Orthodoxy rather than bring them closer," the rabbi added.

A second rabbi, who also did not wish his name used, said, "Combined with the recent controversy over whether Orthodox Jews can accept evolution, the cancellation of a conference on the agunah [women who are not given a religious divorce by their husbands] problem and the refusal of the Chief Rabbinate [of Israel] to accept conversions under the RCA over the summer, this is an attempt to marginalize modern Orthodoxy and remake Orthodoxy in the haredi image."

Rabbi Tradburks stressed that conversion under Halachah is part of the "legal structure" of Judaism and "you have to meet the legal requirements."

Even though the rabbinate is sympathetic to couples who have experienced the stresses of infertility and wish to adopt a child, "compassion cannot trump the legal structure."

He acknowledged that ironies could arise, such as the prospective adopting couple being more observant and connected to the Jewish people than non-observant Jews whose status is not questioned.

Conversion of infants is part of a larger issue, Rabbi Tradburks maintained – "a looming crisis of Jewish status within the broader North American Jewish community."

With the prevalence of conversions by other branches of Judaism, mixed marriages and the acceptance of patrilineal descent by Reform Jewry, "there are tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of people within the Jewish community who are assumed to be Jews who are not Jewish," he said.

"In the United States, where conversions have been done in large numbers for years, the day will come when it will be hard to assume someone who says they are Jewish really are [Jewish]," by traditional halachic standards.

"The numbers are not insignificant," he added.

In Israel, meanwhile, controversy has percolated over the Jewish status of some Orthodox converts who have wished to move to the Jewish state and who wish to marry there. Personal status issues, such as marriage, divorce and burial, are governed by the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate, but there has not been a universally accepted conversion "gold standard."

Rabbi Saul Emanuel

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal (Vaad Ha'ir), said infant conversions in that city will proceed only if both parents are observant. They must demonstrate "a commitment to Shabbat and festival observance and to Torah Judaism in all spheres," he said.

"There has been a lot of discussion" on these standards, he said, "and this is becoming the norm based on the views of leading Torah authorities."

Rabbi Emanuel said Israel's Chief Rabbinate as well as leading batei din around the world are adopting that standard, though he acknowledged "it may not be that all people will agree."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, a rabbi affiliated with the RCA beit din in Montreal, said their alternative rabbinic court has been performing conversions for 18 months, during which they have converted about half a dozen adopted infants.

He said disagreements within the Orthodox movement over child conversions dates back to an 1864 case when two German rabbis, Zvi Hirsch Kalischer and Azriel Hildesheimer, debated the standards to be applied. Responding to a query from a rabbi in New Orleans, Rabbi Kalischer argued that if the child was brought up in a home where there was potential for him to grow in observance – even where the mother was gentile – the conversion should be approved. Rabbi Hildesheimer believed conversions should not be approved unless the parents were observant.

Modern Orthodox rabbis have adopted a perspective similar to Rabbi Kalischer in that "we are open to any case with potential for growth, with some major modifications, to be sure," Rabbi Steinmetz stated.

"Now, because of the worldwide upheaval regarding conversion, with the haredim in Israel putting enormous pressure on the Chief Rabbinate and on the Orthodox world, the RCA is reviewing the issue," Rabbi Steinmetz, who identifies himself as a moderate, said.

Rabbi Steinmetz said that approving conversions is "very contextual" and while the issue is being debated in black and white terms – whether more stress should be placed on observance or Jewish identity – moderates "take a mixed perspective" and look not just for current observance but for the potential for growth in observance.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa said the beit din there has not had requests recently for child conversions but he would recommend parents wait until the RCA decision.

"The rabbis in Israel are weighing down heavily as they have instances of people coming to them who didn't measure up and they see the problem due to standards that are not universal," Rabbi Bulka stated.

"I am of the opnion that once halachic dictates have been met, our general philosophy should be one of welcoming rather than throwing away," he added.

He expects people unwilling to agree to the new, more stringent standards will go elsewhere.

In Toronto, meanwhile, Rabbi Tradburks explained that the criteria for child conversions were set in the Talmud, on the assumption they would be a "merit to the child" – that the child would grow up and observe the mitzvot. "That's the crux of it." If a converted child falls short of his Jewish obligations, he would not be considered a good Jew though he or she might otherwise have been "a very meritorious non-Jew," Rabbi Tradburks said.

In making its decision whether to convert a youngster, the beit din might act in disagreement with the parents' conception of the best interest of the child. "What is meritorious has to be seen within the structure of the Halachah," he said.

Rabbi Tradburks said the conversion issue has been the subject of disagreement between two eminent scholars. The late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, "one of the great poskim (halachic decisors)," addressed the issue and set the criteria that have been applied by the Toronto beit din until recently. He believed that "surrounded by the influence of a day school, there was a good chance that when [the child] grew up, he'd retain [the practice of Judaism] and more."

In the years since the late rabbi advanced that view, the influence of a day school education may have been eroded and the perspective of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik has gained currency. Rabbi Soloveitchik took a stricter line, arguing one couldn't assume that a day school education will have the greatest influence on a child. He felt it was important for the child to grow up in a fully observant home and only that would ensure he or she would become an observant adult Jew, Rabbi Tradburks said.

Asked whether the stricter standards – if adopted – would prompt some families to look to other streams of Judaism, Rabbi Tradburks said, "My gut tells me that people will probably not be willing to conform" if they have not been living an observant lifestyle.

But, he continued, rabbis in other cities tell him parents are willing to do whatever it takes to convert their child under Orthodox auspices.

It's a small world after all, for nano-explorers

MONTREAL — "Nanotechnology is like an Italian opera. Everyone is having fun but very few people understand the words," says physics professor Ron Folman, who is in the forefront of Israel's quest to become a world player in this burgeoning field.

As the former host of a popular educational television series, Folman is one of the few people who can fill the layperson in on what all the excitement is about.

He did just that during a recent Canadian tour, organized by the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Folman directs Israel's first and only atom-chip lab at BGU's the Ilse Katz Centre for Meso- and Nano-scale Science and Technology. The atom chip is being hailed as the successor to the silicon chip because it will enable computers to operate much faster. Nanotechnology is expected to have an incalculable number of commercial applications in the next couple of decades in industry, medicine, communications and security, and has prospective investors buzzing.

Folman predicted that nanotechnology will already have a $1-trillion market by 2015. The Negev has been designated by the government as the centre of Israel's nanotechnology research and development, which is seen as key to both the region's and the country's future economic prosperity.

Folman, who was born in Israel in 1963, was recruited by BGU in 2003. After years of study and research in Europe, he wanted to be part of what he thinks will be a "Nano Valley" in the Negev, that will rival the earlier generation Silicon Valley of California.

Over 100 scientists from the fields of chemistry, physics, biology, engineering and other disciplines are now working on nano-related projects at BGU.

Nanotechnology basically means working with atomic and molecular particles that are as small as a millionth of a millimetre or are about the size of the width of human hair – divided by 100,000, Folman said.

Researchers are learning how to control and manipulate these particles in order to combine atoms from entirely different substances and arrange them in a desired shape.

"Nanotechnology is allowing us to go down in size while going up in complexity and functionality. It's like Lego; when we can manipulate molecules and atoms in the way that a child can assemble red, yellow and blue pieces of Lego, the variety is infinite, the possibilities are limitless," he said.

Folman described a few of the seemingly fantastic uses of nanotechnology.

"It means you can put the whole Library of Congress on the tip of a pencil," he said. A device the size of a wristwatch could hold thousands of chemical and biological labs that would determine if there are contaminants in the air and water.

Being able to manufacture on such an infinitesimal scale will allow the production of the strongest, hardest and lightest materials ever known, and they might even be able to repair themselves.

This would revolutionize the way aircraft and vehicles are manufactured, he said. Folman foresees the construction of "elevators" to space station some 100 kilometres above the earth.

In medicine, tiny "missiles" could be made that would deliver drugs directly inside cancer cells, thereby avoiding damage to healthy cells, or clear blocked arteries in the brain, he said.

The myriad other potential uses of technology include cheaper cleaning and desalinization of water, more efficient solar-energy panels, super-accurate clocks and navigation systems, increased agricultural productivity and expanded information technology. Temperature-sensitive clothing could be made or military uniforms that automatically take on camouflage as needed.

The world is already starting to take notice of what is going on in the Negev. Folman received a $1-million-euro grant from the German government for the atom-chip project. The Nano Fabrication Facility in which he works is specially designed to be completely dust-free and without vibrations. The building is literally riding on air cushions, he said.

BGU was also chosen by the European Union for a consortium of labs' research & development in quantum technology, and the American Institute of Standards has also made a grant toward its work.

Intel, the American computing products giant, is now producing its Pentium IV chip in the Negev, he added

Rally for Truth, L

Nearly 4000 condemn Holocaust denial in Iran and elsewhere
Rally attracts community and political leaders

It was an evening dedicated to truth and a powerful collective expression of opposition to Iran's recent Holocaust denial conference.

More than 120 Jewish and non-Jewish organizations co-sponsored the December 21st Toronto Rally for Truth, Light and Freedom, attended by close to 4,000 people, including keynote speaker, Professor Alan Dershowitz, and political representatives from all parties at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The rally was organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

In addition to Dershowitz, the rally, emceed by author and National Post newspaper columnist Linda Frum Sokolowski, featured Canada's Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs Peter Van Loan; Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant; Father Raymond de Souza, a Catholic priest, author and lecturer who also writes for the National Post; Holocaust survivors Martin Maxwell and Max Eisen; and William McBurney, one of Eisen's concentration camp liberators, via satellite from Queens Village, New York.

Nearly 4000 participants packed Beth Tzedec Congregation to attend the Rally for Truth, Light & Freedom.

Keynote speaker, Professor Alan Dershowitz, addressed UJA Federation's leading supporters before the rally.

Dershowitz called Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad the "Hitler of the 21st century…a dictator who denies one Holocaust in order to bring about another Holocaust." He challenged both the United Nations and the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands to take action against Ahmadinejad, or else they, too, would be held liable for the Iranian leader's actions.

Together with former Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Dershowitz is preparing an indictment against Ahmadinejad to bring the Iranian leader before the International Court of Justice for incitement to genocide.

Emcee Frum Sokolowski warned that Holocaust deniers, such as those who attended the Iranian conference, should be taken very seriously.

"Holocaust deniers say 'the Nazis did not kill the Jews.' Then they add 'anyway, the Jews deserved it.' And they conclude 'we intend to try again.'"

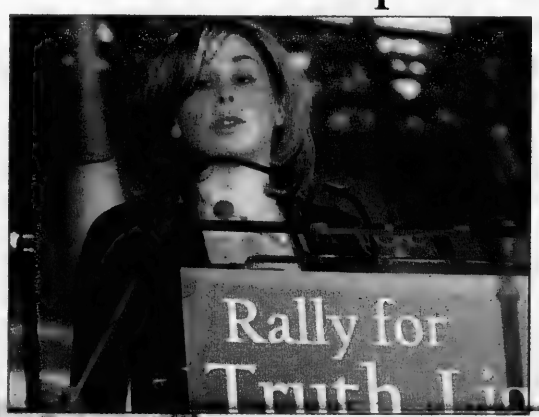
Survivor Max Eisen warned that the Holocaust began with words. "Those words," he continued, "led to actions. Those actions led to the attempted annihilation of all the Jews of Europe, and today we hear these ugly words of hatred emanating from countries around the globe."

Liberator William McBurney, a member of the 761st U.S. army tank battalion, known as the Black Panthers, called Holocaust deniers "liars who have hate in their hearts and minds."

Rally is just the beginning, say organizers
Future action planned to counter Iran

Thousands of participants at the Toronto Rally for Truth, Light & Freedom walked away with a challenge issued by keynote speaker Alan Dershowitz: commit just two hours a week to Israel and against forces, such as Holocaust deniers, who threaten Israel. Rally organizers offered community members the means of accepting the challenge.

An information flyer, which provided key political contact information, suggested several ways in which Canada could continue demonstrating its strong opposition to Iranian actions.



Rally emcee Linda Frum Sokolowski urged participants to continue their activism against the Iranian regime.

Among the suggested measures are:

- Canadian support for bringing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to justice before a competent international tribunal for incitement to genocide
- Referring Iran to both the Special Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court and the appropriate UN agencies to account for the actions of its leader
- Preventing the Iranian regime from acquiring nuclear weapons
- Lending strong support for Argentina's efforts to bring Iranian leaders to justice for orchestrating the deadly 1994 bombing of the Argentine Jewish Community Centre

In addition, a letter will soon be e-mailed to thousands of people, outlining the Iranian regime's troubling activities and urging recipients to transmit the letter to at least five others they know in order to encourage sustained federal government action.

"We are proud," the letter says, "that Canada has vigorously condemned the Holocaust denial conference and Iranian President Ahmadinejad's anti-Israel statements, as well as taking a principled stand at the UN in defense of human rights. We also ask that it back the international panel of diplomats and lawyers seeking Ahmadinejad's prosecution for advocating genocide."

Rally emcee Linda Frum Sokolowski cautioned that "the impact of this rally will quickly fade away unless everyone – younger and older - makes a personal commitment - a commitment to empower ourselves and the people around us to forcefully oppose those who advocate hatred and genocide."

"In this way," she continued, "we will be making a pledge to the courageous Holocaust survivors among us. We will never allow you to be de-humanized and degraded again."

Early Years Open House: Real Teachers, Real Curriculum in Action!

Our world is rapidly changing and we find ourselves very much part of a global village. This provides us with unique challenges as educators in our quest to prepare our students for a future that is difficult to imagine.

At the Toronto Heschel School, we take aim at this challenge by providing a learning environment for our students that is both rich in knowledge and also contains a lot of sensory stimulation. "Our pre-school and grade 1 programme is structured yet flexible," says principal Gail Baker. "There is an ebb and flow to our day that ensure the developmental needs of this age group are met. While there is a set curriculum in both general and Judaic studies, the curriculum allows for the curiosities and eagerness of each child in an integrated environment."

The fantastic new building and grounds provide the perfect context for this type of learning. Grade 1 students are natural scientists, for example, as many of their classes are conducted outdoors and in our organic garden. They bring evidence of their learning back into their rooms in a seamless effort to integrate their learning.

"My son absolutely loves kindergarten at Heschel, says parent Elisha Margles, who has three children at Heschel, two currently in JK and Grade 1. It's amazing to me to see how much the kids are encouraged to imagine and use their creativity to solve problems, even at a young age." Eileen Jadd, also a parent of three Heschel students, shares this enthusiasm. "I'm so glad we enrolled the kids at the beginning, in JK. The results of learning in such a unique, rich atmosphere became evident right away. I still can't believe how much young children can care about the environment. I wouldn't have wanted them to miss a thing!"

"Education begins with the joy and satisfaction of achievement, mastery and growth," says curriculum director Greg Beiles. "By engaging students in activities that are meaningful and contextualized, we are able to achieve our goals."

For more information about curriculum in JK, SK and Grade 1 at The Toronto Heschel School, come out to a special open house on January 31, 2007 from 8:00 – 9:30pm. Meet the teachers! Swastikas spray-painted on Jewish buildings

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish Community Campus and a nearby synagogue in Snowdon were spray-painted with anti-Semitic graffiti over the holidays.

Sometime during the night of Dec. 27-28, two large swastikas and three slogans in Cyrillic script were spray-painted on buildings that house FEDERATION CJA, the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors and the Saidye Bronfman Centre, attached to the YM-YWHA.

All but one of the marks appeared on the Mountain Sights Avenue side of the structures, said Bram Freedman, the federation's director of external relations. The other was on Westbury Avenue.

Several blocks to the south, a swastika was discovered at Congregation Zichron Kedoshim.

A large swastika marks 2 Cummings Square at the Jewish Community Campus.

"In the past, this happened in the back of the synagogue or in alleyways. This time, it was more bold and threatening," said Leah Berger of B'nai Brith Canada's Eastern region.

According to Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Montreal Jewish Security Advisory Committee, the presence of Russian-language slogans suggests that the daubs were "probably an extension" of similar incidents in the area dating back a year and linked to neo-Nazi ultra-nationalists of Russian origin.

However, he cautioned that such incidents are usually best fully understood "in retrospect… if it persists from that community. Right now it seems isolated."

Rabbi Poupko said it was the first time in his memory that anti-Semitic graffiti had appeared at the federation itself. Berger noted that unlike a year ago, this time the perpetrator(s) left no signature linked to a specific group. In early January, 2006, a rash of swastikas, also large, appeared on several non-Jewish sites close in proximity to the community campus – one of them across the street at Mackenzie King Park. Those seven daubs included Nazi swastikas and the letters "HCO," the Cyrillic acronym for New Free Society, an ultra-nationalist Russian organization.

This time, the Russian-language slogans this time at the campus, while not including that acronym, did have the phrase, "Death to the dirty Jews," Berger said.

Another Jewish site was targeted last March. An anti-Semitic daub was found at the C.H.A.I. Centre on de Courtrai Avenue. Also located in the Snowdon area are a number of Jewish schools, synagogues, and community and religious institutions.

Berger said as soon as her organization heard about this year's graffiti over its hotline the morning of Dec. 28, B'nai Brith was in contact with Police Station 25, which serves the area, as well as with the police's Hate Crimes Unit and the terrorism unit of the Sûreté du Québec.

Similarly, Freedman said the police were called as soon as the graffiti were discovered early in the morning of Dec. 28. Overall Jewish community security is co-ordinated by FEDERATION CJA. Its security director, Michel Bujold, referred The CJN to Freedman for comment, as did Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region interim communications director Nili Berner.

"We appreciated the gravity of the situation," Freedman said. "The police took a detailed report and pictures were taken. Then we erased the graffiti. It was a workday, but very quiet. We're satisfied with the way things were handled."

Freedman said no additional security measures have been put into place since the incident, and declined to comment on whether any surveillance cameras used by the campus captured any suspects on video.

Simonetta Barth, commander of Police Station 25, could not be reached for comment. But police spokesperson Melanie Lajoie told The CJN that according to what Barth told her, the investigation was ongoing and nothing concrete had yet developed.

Israeli debating team reaches championship finals

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — A team of five Israelis participated in last week's 2007 World Universities Debating Championships, held at the University of British Columbia.

"It's the primary debating competition in the world, the largest, most prestigious and most difficult," said Raanan Eichler, 26, a master's student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The Israelis made it to the ESL (English as a second language) final, which Malaysia won. "Even though we didn't win the ESL final, we're satisfied with our performance," Eichler says. "During the competition we competed against amazing English-speaking teams from the best universities. Some we beat and some we lost to, but we stood up well against them."

Approximately 320 teams consisting of two debaters each participated in the championship, along with 300 adjudicators. Each debate consisted of four teams: two representing the proposition and two representing the opposition. They were judged by at least three adjudicators for their debating skill of a topic that was usually political, legal or international in nature.

The topics were as various as regime change in Myanmar/Burma and banning cosmetic surgery. "So far there have been no motions on Judaism or Israel, but it so happened that during a debate on whether Quebec should gain independence, one guy got up and opined that Israel wasn't a democratic country," says Elhanan Miller, 25, a third-year student of Middle Eastern history and Islam at Hebrew University.

The Israeli team at the 2007 World Universities Debating Championships included, from left, Elad Ofek, Elhanan Miller, Nimrod Avissar and Raanan Eichler and Ilana Berman, seated.

"We voiced our offence on that point and actually beat his team in that round, and he later came up to us and apologized."

Participating in the championship has been a great experience, he said. "People from so many countries meet here, and they all speak a common language: the language of debating. No matter where they're from or what their academic background, they can all communicate. It's a form of globalization, and the personal contact goes a far way in bridging gaps between people who don't get to meet on a normal basis."

Each student arrives at the championship with his or her own motivation for debating. Eichler finds debating fun and useful, "and not many things are both," he says. "It's fun because you get to try your best against a skilled opponent, learn new strategies, constantly get better and learn from your mistakes. And it's useful because it teaches you to speak in public in a clear and interesting manner, to find the holes in other people's arguments and to organize your thoughts."

But he also comes to this communications sport with an idealistic stake, he confesses. "Many Israelis will tell you that one of Israel's main problems is that when it comes to political issues, people entrench themselves in prefabricated positions and don't spend enough time actually listening to others or really thinking about a topic," says Eichler.

"Debating forces you to really think about a topic because often you have to defend a stance that you don't believe in. It also forces you to actually listen to your opponents, because you have to convince the judges that your opponents are wrong. It's not enough to convince yourself."

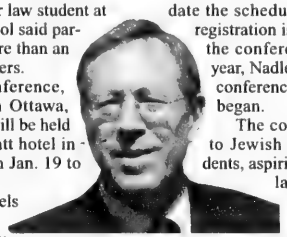
Law students to gather

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish Law Students' Association will hold its 20th annual conference in Toronto next week, and conference chair Batya Nadler hopes to celebrate this milestone by making it bigger and better than ever.

Nadler, a second-year law student at Osgoode Hall Law School said participants can expect more than an impressive list of speakers.

This year, the conference, which rotates between Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal, will be held at the upscale Park Hyatt hotel in downtown Toronto from Jan. 19 to 21.



Irwin Cotler

"We're setting up panels of professionals from downtown firms from different practices. There will be roundtables so students can go from table to table to network and collect business cards, learn about the different practice areas, and learn about being a Jew on Bay Street," Nadler said.

"It's also a huge social event for law students. You meet people from all the law schools across Canada, and you get a chance to hang out. There's lots of free time during the nights."

Speakers at the conference, titled "If Not Now, When: International Crises, Legal Responses and the Road Ahead," include Israeli Ambassador to Canada Alan Baker, former justice minister MP Irwin Cotler, former deputy prime minister Herb Gray, and senior legal council of B'nai Brith Canada, David Matas.

"Because this is the 25th anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we're celebrating that. We're having a couple people address constitutional issues and charter issues," Nadler said.

"[They're also] going to be addressing human rights issues in Iran and Sudan, Palestinian issues and general anti-Semitism."

She said that in an effort to accommodate the schedules of busy law students, registration is open until the day before the conference is set to begin. Last year, Nadler herself registered for the conference in Ottawa a day before it began.

The conference – which is open to Jewish and non-Jewish law students, aspiring law students and young lawyers – costs $200 to attend and includes two nights in the Park Hyatt and meals.

But participants have the option of finding their own accommodations or staying with family and friends in the area.

Students coming from Montreal can get travel discounts with Via Rail or Air Canada and are also eligible for a $150 grant from their dean.

Nadler said the conference is primarily attended by students from Toronto Ottawa and Montreal, but some also come from Queen's University, University of Western Ontario, University of Windsor, and a few from schools on the west coast.

Nadler hopes to exceed last year's turnout. She said last year, about 130 students attended the conference and she is aiming for a gathering of about 200.

Israel may have planted Times 'exposé'

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

Analysis

There's nothing new in the lengthy Sunday Times report on Israel's plans to attack Iran. Foreign sources wrote years ago that Israel had developed tactical nuclear devices, alongside the strategic variety. The assessment by intelligence experts that conventional bombs can't destroy fortified installations deep underground has also been heard before. Putting two and two together shouldn't be that hard.

Neither should the fact that Israeli combat planes have flown training sorties to Gibraltar and back – simulating the distance of a potential attack on Iran – come as a surprise. Over the last decade-and-a-half, the great majority of the U.S. military aid to Israel has been spent on F-15I and F-16I fighter-bombers that are specially equipped for long-range strategic bombing, and Israel's air-to-air refuelling tankers have been improved accordingly.

Since a plane taking off in the Negev can reach the northern border in less than a quarter of an hour, these planes were obviously bought for something more ambitious than bombing Hezbollah positions in Lebanon.

What is interesting, though, is the timing of the report, which followed a similar one, less noticed perhaps, two days earlier in the Spectator. What both British reports have in common, aside from their timing, is that they both highlight the possibility that Israel might use neutron bombs and that both were written by veteran journalists with Israeli connections.

That brings to mind another less well-known Israeli capability: planting false stories in prestigious foreign publications to serve hidden interests.

For Israel to be the first country to use nuclear weapons – even limited ones – since Hiroshima and Nagasaki is almost unthinkable. Diplomatic repercussions aside, there is no guarantee that an untried and unproven technology will work as planned. And even if the operation is carried off, Iran may have dispersed enough of its nuclear materials and installations to alternative sites that it would be able to resume the program quickly. And with Israel's nuclear cat already out of the bag, Iran would definitely do so.

There are still valid arguments for Israel to go ahead with a military operation against Iran, perhaps even a non-conventional one. But the current leadership – which is still reeling from the Lebanon war, and which prefers that Sderot suffer a couple of Qassams a day to getting entangled in another bloody operation in Gaza – is hardly the leadership to take Israel into a daring operation so far away.

Instead, the government would prefer to rely on the vague promises from U.S. President George W. Bush that he won't leave office in two years with the Iranian threat still intact. But since the U.S. cooperated with the ineffectual, watered-down United Nations Security Council sanctions resolution that was finally passed last month, Israeli fears have grown that the administration has lost the stomach for another front in the Middle East.

Perhaps a few stories of the crazy Israelis' plans to go it themselves – and even use some of their own nukes in the process – might convince the Americans that it would be better if they did the job themselves.

'IDF can stop Iran's nuclear program'

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel is capable of stopping Iran's nuclear program with an independent military strike, a former head of the Israel Air Force who was involved in the 1981 bombing of Iraq's Osirak reactor has told the Jerusalem Post.

According to the former commander, the IAF could use its U.S.-made F-16I and F-15I fighter jets to reach Iran and, if not completely destroy the program, at least cause enough damage to set back the development of a nuclear weapon by several years.

"Israel can do it," the officer said. "All you have to do is pick a number of essential targets and destroy them. This way you delay the process and wait to see what happens."

In 1981, a formation of eight F-16 fighter jets flew just over 2,000 kilometres and destroyed the Osirak reactor near Baghdad. According to the former air force chief, Israel could use its F-15Is – with a combat range of close to 4,400 kilometres – and the F-16Is it purchased in the late 1990s, all capable of striking Iran without refuelling, much like the operation against Osirak.

Senior security officials told the Post that Israel would have to obtain "precise intelligence" on the nuclear facilities it planned to target.

Israeli military intelligence, however, admits it works under the assumption that it is not aware of all of Iran's nuclear facilities. Senior officers say the assumption is that Tehran has built covert installations for its military nuclear program.

There are additional complications. While Osirak was a distant target that required expert pilots who could manoeuvre at low altitude, it was only one facility and it was above ground. A number of Iran's nuclear facilities are underground and are heavily fortified, some with steel reinforcements and others with layers of concrete.

According to a senior Israeli official involved in security and strategic affairs, the military would need precise intelligence on every facility to be able to choose the most effective weapons.

"We would need to know all of the specifications," he said, "whether the bunker is fortified by steel or concrete and even how thick it is."

Earlier this month, the Institute for National Security Studies (formerly known as the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies) at Tel Aviv University released its annual Middle East Strategic Balance with one major conclusion: "Without military action, an Iranian nuclear bomb is only a matter of time."

The think tank also said Israel is capable of carrying out a military strike against Iran on its own.

Officials deride paper's report military sources have disclosed details of two Israel Air Force (IAF) squadrons that have been training to blow up an enrichment plant in Natanz in central Iran using low-yield nuclear bunker busters.

A heavy-water plant at Arak and a uranium conversion plant at Isfahan would also be targeted, using conventional bombs, the newspaper says.

The plan reportedly envisages conventional laser-guided bombs opening "tunnels" into the targets. Nuclear warheads would then be fired into the plant at Natanz, exploding deep underground to reduce radioactive fallout.

IAF pilots have flown to Gibraltar in recent weeks to train for the 2,000-mile round trip to the Iranian targets, the newspaper said, adding that three possible routes to Iran had been mapped out, including one over Turkey.

It suggested that Israel may be trying to scare Iran or to cajole the United States into taking stronger action against Tehran's nuclear program.

However, the report went on to speculate that Israel may strike at Iran's nuclear facilities and pressure the Americans to agree with the move after the event.

Israeli analysts derided the report. Ephraim Kam, a strategic expert at Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Strategic Studies and formerly a senior Israel Defence Forces intelligence officer, said, "No reliable source would ever speak about this, certainly not to the Sunday Times."

Israelis provide training for Rwandan youth village

By STEPHANIE FREID

YEMIN ORDE, Israel — Jean-Pierre Nkuranga was 20 in 1994 when he hid in the bushes outside his home in Rwanda and watched helplessly as Hutu militiamen ruthlessly attacked his family members. He lost four siblings and both parents in the carnage that was later known as Rwanda's genocide.

"Children heads of household were common – some as young as 10. The kids would put together households of other kids and live in the streets or build tent camps with leaves and mud," Nkuranga said.

The 1994 Rwandan genocide left more than 800,000 Tutsis dead. One of the most devastating aftermaths of the tragedy was the approximately 1.2 million children – almost 15 per cent of the Rwandan population – who became instant orphans and lost their homes forever. Nkuranga became the parent to his four remaining siblings in the aftermath of the violence, and he eventually took in six additional neighbouring children.

Overcome by the enormity of loss, Nkuranga vowed to help build a future for the children orphaned in Rwanda. And today, he's beginning to achieve that goal with the help of Israel.

Nkuranga was part of a 10-person delegation of Rwandan youth experts who recently spent a week at the Yemin Orde Youth Village south of Haifa in order to get information that would help them open the Agahozo-Shalom Village in Rwanda, to be modelled after Yemin Orde.

A high percentage of Yemin Orde's children are of Ethiopian origin and suffered through similar stories of parent separation, trauma and displacement following Israel's airlifts – Operations Moses and Solomon – in the 1980s and '90s. Initiated to safeguard Ethiopia's Jews from famine and political persecution, the airlifts brought more than 22,000 Ethiopians out of Africa, and in the process, some children were orphaned and others faced various hardships.

Now, some of those children-turned-adults are helping the Rwandan counsellors in establishing the program for the orphans of Rwanda.

"A large percentage of Ethiopian children have had to straddle the social and cultural worlds of Israel versus Ethiopia, and it has been difficult," said Yissaschar Mekonen, director of the Israeli-Ethiopian Advisory Team to the Rwandan Village. A graduate of Yemin Orde, Mekonen immigrated to Israel in the early 1970s

"It has trickled down from the parents. When your parent can't help you with homework because he can't read or write… Yemin Orde offers a parenting alternative," he said.

The Rwanda Agahozo-Shalom Village goal will provide a comprehensive response to youth displacement by establishing a multi-faceted youth village like Yemin Orde, based on the concept of the "village" as home. Children are fostered by a holistic and protective environment to help them overcome trauma and abandonment issues.

"We are here to get professional, consistent modelling," Nkuranga said during a break in the weeklong series of meetings, seminars and information gathering. "Back home, urgent needs are being met and we're putting out fires. Based on what we learn here, we'll be able to take our children all the way to autonomy and guarantee their future. We can organize their care so that they rebuild themselves in an autonomous way."

Manhattan-based project initiator and Agahozo-Shalom director Anne Heyman said that the idea for the village was sparked during a dinner conversation. "I asked Paul [Paul Rusesabinga, subject of the film Hotel Rwanda], 'What's the biggest problem you have in Rwanda?' and he told me that in a country where there are 1.2 million orphans out of a population of eight million, there is no future for that country."

For Heyman, Rusesabinga's words were a calling. She began researching orphanages and phoning contacts, which led her earlier this year to then-Yemin Orde director Chaim Peri. Since deciding to model the Rwandan village after the Yemin Orde model, her life has been a flurry of shuttles between the United States, Rwanda and Israel, where she is organizing teams, buying land in Rwanda and drumming up donors.

The Ethiopian-Israeli and Rwandan collaboration was a natural extension of Heyman's plan – the Ethiopian team has travelled once to Rwanda to consult locally and the Rwandan team has been in Israel twice.

During their week in Israel, Rwandan committee members attended lectures and meetings to learn about everything from channelling extra-curricular interests and fostering cultural practices to troubleshooting problem areas.

The delegation spent long hours on Yemin Orde's campus to gather in-depth information about the philosophies, functions and daily routines of Yemin Orde staff roles, from counsellors, advisers and administrators to house mothers. They also took notes about Yemin Orde's layout to help them set up learning areas, living quarters, dining room and recreation spaces in the Rwanda village.Teams worked easily together, sharing ideas, laughter and cultural cues non-Africans might not understand.

"I do this 'o' sign with my thumb and index finger and the Rwandans know it means 'zero.' Other people think I mean 'okay,'" Mekonen said. "It's small, but it's part of the larger picture."

The exchange will continue up to the projected 2008 launch of the Agahozo-Shalom Village. According to Heyman, during initial stages, a team of a dozen Ethiopian-Israelis will be on the ground in Rwanda for several weeks to oversee operations and troubleshoot when necessary.

"Initially I felt like, 'What do I have to offer them?'" Mekonen said. "We were a few people from Ethiopia who walked a few kilometres to Sudan and were airlifted out. What can I tell someone who saw his entire family murdered?'"

"But it turns out that our story of leaving our Ethiopian home and culture and succeeding in Israeli society is very big to them. We did it well, sometimes with parents still behind in Ethiopia. This success is what they want to model for the Rwandan youth left behind."

The Rwandan advisory committee includes a member of Rwanda's education ministry, an AIDS counsellor, an expert on widow and children survivors of genocide, and a child-headed household specialist.

"The communication and the sharing show us that the concept works and gives us the hope for doing something similar when we return home," Rwandan reconciliation adviser Albert Nzamukewereka said. "We don't have to make a cultural transition – we're from the same place, really – and that makes it easier."

When Yemin Orde graduate Racheli Ugado travelled to Rwanda in July as part of an Israeli contingent, she described it as revisiting home. "I came [to Israel] on Operation Solomon when I was seven, so I remember a lot," she said. "Rwanda felt like being back in Ethiopia. I'm still very connected to it. Helping my brothers in Africa so that they can help themselves feels natural."

The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 23, 2007.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 1, 2007. Have fun and good luck.

'Important for his dignity, pride and his rights'

ever sent to a WUJS event.

She said CFJS, which "reaches" 5,000 of Canada's 32,000 Jewish students, has signed on to the letter and will bring up the issue to educate delegates at upcoming CFJS conferences.

She called Nadia Cohen's address a "powerful" reminder about the issue and "why it's important to have [Eli Cohen's] body brought back. It's important for his dignity, pride and his rights," Lantsman said.

Eli Cohen, a native of Alexandria, Egypt, was hanged as an Israeli spy on May 18, 1965, on live TV. Cohen's family originally hailed from Aleppo, Syria. He was recruited to the Mossad and eventually became their most successful spy ever.

From 1962 to his death at age 41, he used the cover of a wealthy Syrian merchant to cultivate contacts among the top leadership of Syrian society and the government. He befriended Syria's president at the time, Amin el Hafiz, and at the time of his death was being considered as a candidate for deputy minister of defence.

His intelligence about Syrian military positions in the Golan Heights was used with great effect by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War.

Earlier, he attended the national convention of the ruling Ba'ath party and learned of Syria's plans to cut off Israeli water supplies by diverting the headwaters of the Jordan River.

The Israeli Defence Forces used that information to bomb Syrian positions and put an end to the plan.

Maurice Cohen launched an international effort in recent years to repatriate Eli's remains. Part of that campaign is an international online petition (www.elicohen.org) to be presented to Syrian President Bashar Assad. It has more than 5,500 signatures.

43 Jewish lawmakers in new American Congress

JTA

WASHINGTON — Thirty Jewish members of the U.S. House of Representatives and 13 Jewish U.S. senators were sworn in. The 43 Jewish lawmakers assuming office last Thursday in the 110th Congress include 29 Democrats and one Republican in the House of Representatives and nine Democrats, two Republicans and two independents who caucus with the Democrats in the Senate. The number of Jewish senators sets a record; there were more than 30 Jewish House members between 1990 and 1994.

Democrat Nancy Pelosi became the first woman speaker of the House and second in line to the presidency. Pelosi posed at the swearing-in of Democrat Keith Ellison, who used a Qur'an owned by Thomas Jefferson. Ellison is the first Muslim elected to Congress. An array of Jewish groups joined Arab-American and Muslim-American groups in condemning some right-wing assaults on Ellison's decision to use the Qur'an. Two Buddhists also were the first of their faith elected to Congress.

Olmert goes to China

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert travelled to China Monday for talks on the Iranian nuclear threat. The trip also marks 15 years of relations between the countries and seeks to expand Israel's current trade relations.

Olmert's family has historic ties to China: his grandparents fled there from czarist Russia in the early 1900s, and his parents were born and raised there.

"China is the country which hosted my parents. They studied in China. They spoke Chinese. They grew up in China, and the Chinese culture is part of my heritage and part of my earliest memory as a young kid in the State of Israel," Olmert was quoted as telling the Chinese news agency Xinhua.

"So China is not just another country for me."

Israel Briefs

Mubarak, Olmert meeting unproductive

Hosni Mubarak criticized an Israeli anti-terrorist raid during a meeting with Ehud Olmert that had been expected to produce help for a kidnapped Israeli soldier. The Egyptian president and the Israeli prime minister's meeting last Thursday in Sharm el-Sheik was expected to focus on procuring the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, taken by Palestinian gunmen in June. Reports said the meeting, which also was to address wider issues of regional peace, was strained due to the deaths of four Palestinians in a Ramallah raid earlier that day.

Israeli budget passes

The Knesset passed Israel's 2007 budget. Lawmakers ratified the $71 billion (US) package by a 63-31 vote last Thursday, an achievement credited to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's robust coalition. The 2007 budget features boosted spending on the underprivileged, as well as national defence, the latter a result of lessons learned from the Lebanon war last summer.

Livni leads Kadima poll

Tzipi Livni has the support of Kadima voters for party leadership and the premiership, according to a new poll. Israel Radio last week released the poll of 345 Kadima voters conducted by Panorama Markets. It found that 49 per cent of Kadima voters would back the Israeli foreign minister as party leader if early elections were held, compared to 8.7 per cent for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Iranian bomb seen inevitable

Only military action might prevent Iran from attaining nuclear weapons, an Israeli study found. The study released last week by the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University concluded: "Without military action, an Iranian nuclear bomb is a matter of time." Though the researchers said Israel has the capabilities to launch a pre-emptive strike on Iran, something over which foreign experts have voiced doubt, they also called for Jerusalem to allow western diplomatic pressure on Tehran to run its course.

Chief of staff admits errors, rejects calls to quit

The Israeli army's chief of staff admitted to failures in the recent Lebanon war, but he rejected calls for his resignation. Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, responding to an IDF probe on the month-long summer conflict, said that mistakes had been made, but that he intended "to stand up to the inquiry" and stay on in the army in order to "correct what can be corrected," Ha'aretz reported.

Olmert aide probed

A senior aide to Ehud Olmert was questioned by police as part of a graft investigation. Shula Zaken, a senior official in the Prime Minister's Office, was interrogated along with senior officials from the Israel Tax Authority. Police cited suspicions of bribery and breach of trust. According to media reports, Zaken is suspected of having used her connections to arrange top-level jobs in the Tax Authority in exchange for tax breaks.

El Al, Haredim reach accord

El Al reached an agreement with a haredi rabbinical committee, ending an unofficial boycott of El Al flights. The haredim had stopped flying El Al after the carrier offered a Shabbat flight to make up for flights lost because of a strike in December. Under the agreement, El Al will appoint a rabbi to determine when El Al might have to offer a flight on Shabbat in life-or-death situations, but the airline would stick to its general policy of not flying on the Sabbath.

Keeping your New Year's resolutions

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

How many of us make a list of New Year's resolutions with great enthusiasm and excitement? Our intentions are fantastic – We're going to lose that 15 pounds once and for all, write that novel, plan that exotic trip, or take that class we've been wanting to explore. And then by mid-January, we get swept away by our lives and our daily routine and we lose the drive to make our dreams happen. I'll think about it later, we promise ourselves, but later becomes never, and then we have to start all over again the following year.

So how do we actually turn our New Year's resolutions into reality? According to Debbie Ford in The Best Year of Your Life, "To live the best year of your life, you first have to identify what you want. You must create a vision. Having a vision will act as a reference point. Like a good map, having a vision clarifies the steps you need to take in order to arrive at your desired destination."

It also helps to visualize what goal you really want to achieve and then create a plan of action around that goal. So you might ask yourself what exactly you want to achieve and what date you want to achieve it by, and then perform three small actions towards that goal. If it's weight loss you're after, you might write down the goal weight you wish to reach and then give yourself a realistic time frame in which to reach it. The last part of the plan is the most difficult and probably the most important. You want to take three concrete steps that will move you closer to your goal. For instance, your actions could be joining a weight loss group, committing yourself to drinking two litres of water a day and creating a fun and enjoyable exercise plan that will keep you inspired and excited about doing this for yourself.

When facing a difficult challenge like losing weight or clearing the clutter and getting organized, or even finding a career that is really fulfilling, it helps to visualize how you will look and feel at 20 pounds lighter, how much calmer you will be when your office is neat and organized or how inspired you will feel when you love what you do.

I often invite my clients to imagine what it would look like to be that new weight or to picture themselves stepping into that new career. The more you can connect with the exhilaration and fulfilment you will experience when you reach your goal, the greater the chances are you will achieve it.

As Diane Scholten suggests in her book Be Your Own Life Coach, "Dream it, plan it, do it." What a lovely and simple suggestion. Try it and see how magically it works.

When you are setting goals that you would like to accomplish in the next year, Scholten says, ask yourself if the goal is specific. If it's not, think of what you need to do to make it clearer. She also recommends that you make the goal measurable and decide how you will know when you've achieved it. And ask yourself if the goal is attainable, if you have the necessary resources needed to achieve the goal and if you've given yourself a realistic timetable.

In a previous column, I described the Wheel of Life that represents your career, relationships, health, personal growth, etc. A great idea is to write your goals under each of the major wedges in your wheel. This way, you can look back and re-evaluate what's working and what needs more attention. Always celebrate your successes and be forgiving about your setbacks.

I wish for all of you that you will make and keep at least one of your New Year's resolutions, and that when you do, it will bring you great joy, fulfilment and bliss.

March of Dimes raises funds to help physically disabled

Ontario March of Dimes hopes to raise $1 million across the province this year.

January is Ontario March of Dimes month, and the organization's largest fundraising campaign of the year is underway.

For more than 55 years, the organization has been holding its annual Door-to-Door Campaign to raise money to help increase the independence and community participation of people with physical disabilities. This year, the organization has recruited more than 13,000 volunteers across Ontario to raise funds for its essential programs and services.

The organization is especially counting on local community support in certain neighbourhoods – including the North York area of Toronto – where there are many volunteers and longtime supporters.

"Our goal is to raise over $20,000 in North York," says Mary Lynne Stewart, director of fund development and communications for Ontario March of Dimes. "With such a supportive community, I know that everyone will [work to help us] exceed our goal."

Funds collected through the Door-to-Door Campaign will help thousands of Ontarians with physical disabilities, many of whom have been waiting months or even years for the programs and services they need.

The Ontario March of Dimes charitable rehabilitation organization provides a wide variety of programs and services to almost 37,000 people annually in 70 communities across the province.

For more information or to volunteer to help with the campaign, call 1-800-263-3463, ext. 7705.

Vinegar Lamps

This story has been adapted from Gemarah Taanis 25a.

Rena Ben-Dosa scrubbed the grimy clay lamps. Shabbat was almost here, and everything had to be ready on time. Mommy was bathing the baby, and Rena's father, Rabbi Chanina Ben-Dosa, was sweeping the floor. And Rena? She was getting the Shabbat lamps ready. She poured the oily, dirty water onto the dirt floor. She shook out the remaining drops and held the lamp up to the window to inspect it. All the congealed oil and soot were gone. Rena dried the lamps off and placed them around the table, hoping there would be enough oil to fill them all. She knew all too well how little oil the family had. They could barely afford food, let alone oil.

Rena carefully checked the jug of oil. Yes, there was more than enough. Carefully, she filled each lamp, knowing that her family couldn't afford to waste even a drop. Finally, she slipped a wick into each lamp. The lamps were ready, just in time for Shabbat.

She touched fire to each wick, one by one. Then she stood back to watch. She loved watching the flames rise and glow as the wicks caught fire.

But the flames didn't rise. Instead, they began to sputter. All too late, Rena realized she had made a terrible mistake.

"Oh, no," Rena gasped. "I filled the lamps with vinegar instead of oil!" Her mind raced. I'll have to pour out the vinegar and change the wicks. And the vinegar is ruined, we'll have to throw it out. What a terrible waste!

"Rena, what's the matter, why are you crying?"

Rena Ben-Dosa looked up from the Sabbath lamps she had just lit.

"I just realized… I put vinegar in the lamps instead of oil!"

She sadly lowered her eyes, watching as the pathetic flames sputtered and smoked.

Mrs. Ben-Dosa didn't say anything.

Now, dear reader, I bet you're thinking, "What's the big deal? You're probably saying to yourself, "Dump out the vinegar and put in oil instead."

Well, you should know that the Ben-Dosas were poor. Really poor. They couldn't afford to buy anything. In fact, they couldn't even afford the things they already had. So half a jug of vinegar lying wasted in the lamps was a big deal for them.

Anyway, back to our story. Rena's in tears over her mistake, her mother doesn't know what to say, and the burning wicks are about to go out, because vinegar doesn't burn. But then Rabbi Chanina Ben-Dosa, the great sage, saint, and more importantly for us, Rena's father, walks in.

"Rena, what's the matter?"

"I put vinegar in the Sabbath lamps."

Rabbi Chanina waved his hand dismissively. "He who makes oil burn can make vinegar burn too."

"What?"

Rabbi Chanina smiled. "Rena dear, why does oil burn?"

"I don't know… It just does," she answered, puzzled.

Her father shook his head. "No, oil doesn't have to burn. Oil burns because God made it burn. Everything in the world happens because God wants it to. And if God wants vinegar to burn, then it will."

"You mean a miracle will happen?"

"Sort of, but I mean more than that. Do you realize that when oil burns, that too is a miracle? There are such wondrous things happening all around us that we've gotten used to them and call them 'natural.' But tell me, Rena, when a flower grows from a tiny seed and blossoms forth from the ground, isn't that miraculous? When the rain falls from the heavens and sustains all mankind, shouldn't we stand in wonder at God's works? When a baby develops and is finally born, isn't that a miracle? God is always doing miracles, nurturing us and guiding us through life. So if He miraculously makes oil burn, why can't He make vinegar burn when necessary?"

He looked down at the vinegar lamps, and Rena followed his glance. The dying fires looked so miserable that Rena thought it was miraculous that they weren't out already.

She waited for them to die. They didn't. The flames crackled, and then flared up. She watched incredulously as the vinegar fires licked at the air and began burning steadily. As the sun set and the Sabbath began, the Ben-Dosas' humble home was filled with light.

Talmudic legend tells us that the vinegar lamps burned throughout the entire Shabbat — that's over 25 hours. And when the Sabbath ended, Rabbi Chanina said the Havdalah prayer over a torch lit from the vinegar lamps of Shabbat.

Can you decode this passage from the Amidah prayer?

Note: Havdalah is the prayer that ends Shabbat, traditionally said over a multi-wicked candle or lamp.

Book takes you on an adventure in Jewish baking

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Have you ever baked challah? There's nothing like the fantastic smell of freshly baked bread that spreads through the house and makes you realize that a special day is coming.

Making your own challah is one of those skills that supposedly prove that you are a truly talented balabuste – a woman who is a spectacular homemaker. (Not that men can't bake challah, too!)

For Jewish women, baking challah has religious meaning. In the days of the temples in Jerusalem, people would give part of their bread to the priests. Now that we don't have a temple, women over the age of bat mitzvah still tear off a piece of the dough and burn it in the oven.

In fact, "taking challah," as it is called, is one of the main mitzvot that women are responsible for – lighting Shabbat and holiday candles are among the others.

This is all very interesting, but baking challah is not that easy to do. A great story about it is Way Too Much Challah Dough, by Goldie Shulman, with illustrations by Vitaliy Romanenko (Hachai Publishing, 2006).

You will really have fun reading this book.

Mindy decided that she wanted to bake challah, but she didn't know how, or how much of anything to use. She called her grandmother to find out what to do.

Bubby, having baked challahs many, many times, told her what ingredients go into challah and the steps required to make it.

It sounded easy.

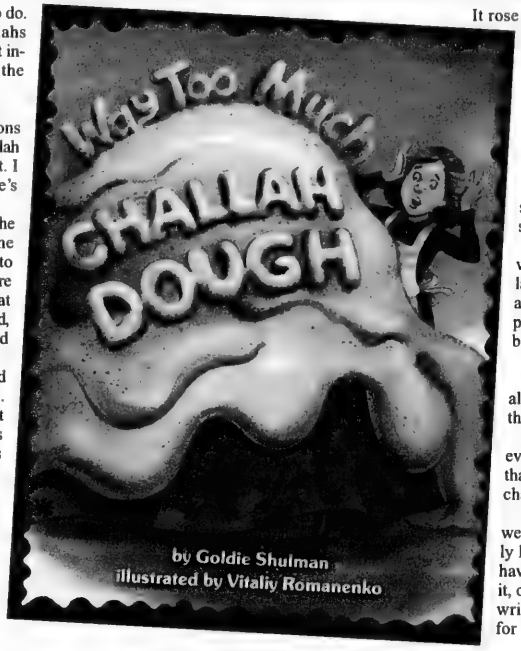
Mindy followed the directions and then declared: "Baking challah was fun – anybody could do it. I thought it was hard, but there's nothing much to it."

But problems started when she got distracted. First the phone rang, and then someone came to the door, so she kept adding more yeast. Finally, she "kneaded that dough, just like Bubby had said, till my shoulders were sore and my face was all red."

(Baking challah, or any kind of bread is actually hard work. Some people even say that punching down dough relieves their anger, or stress, and makes them feel better.)

By the time she finished kneading the dough, Mindy was really tired, so, after adding a little more yeast "just in case," she lay down to rest.

Well, the challah rose, all right – it started to rise right out of the bowl it was in.



It rose and rose and rose, until it filled larger and larger bowls, not to mention the sink, a toy box, a kiddie pool and finally the whole house.

Then, it even found its way outside the house: "Dough had oozed out the door, to the porch, to the ground."

Mindy was getting really scared (well, who wouldn't be?), so she called her Bubby for help.

Bubby came right over, wearing her apron and carrying a large tray. She went into the house and came back out with – surprise – two challahs, "perfectly braided."

It all turned out to be a dream.

When Mindy woke up, she realized what had happened. Luckily, the challah was perfect.

Way Too Much Challah Dough even has a recipe on the back page that includes instructions for taking challah.

Mindy's challah-baking efforts were successful. But to be perfectly honest, the best thing to do is to have someone show you how to do it, or, at the very least, have someone write the proper instructions down for you.

Khrushchev memoirs discusses Jews, anti-Semitism and Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nikita Khrushchev, a wily and impetuous apparatchik, assumed the leadership of the Soviet Union shortly after Joseph Stalin's death in 1953. Compared to his autocratic predecessor, Khrushchev was a breath of fresh air in a stultified political order whose promise of a better society had long passed.

Determined to break with the Stalinist era, Khrushchev ushered in a period of liberalization, during which Soviet Jews became slightly more assertive about expressing their Jewish identity and rights as a minority.

But the thaw was short-lived, and within a few years of his accession to power, the expectations that Khrushchev had raised were more or less dashed. The prospect of Communism with a human face vanished, as did the hope that the systematic oppression of Jews would finally cease.

"A policy of deliberate discrimination, which had already been rationalized in political or economic terms, was now applied with growing frequency in the spheres of government, higher education and employment," writes one observer, the Israeli scholar Benjamin Pinkus in The Soviet Government and the Jews 1948-1967.

Along with these developments, the Soviet Union's Middle East policy became still more pro-Arab.

Khrushchev, whose eldest son had a Jewish wife, played a role in these developments. As Pinkus says, "Khrushchev's anti-Semitism was basically what is known as popular anti-Semitism, rooted in age-old traditions of prejudice and in stereotyped images of the Jew."

By the time he was ousted in a bloodless palace coup in 1964 and replaced by the colourless Leonid Brezhnev, the position of Soviet Jews had deteriorated, though it was not as severe and foreboding as it had been under Stalin.

In light of Khrushchev's generally negative attitude toward Jews, the appearance of the second volume of his posthumous reminiscences, Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev (Penn State University Press), will be of great interest to all Kremlin watchers. Edited by his son, Sergei, a senior fellow at the Thomas J. Watson Jr. Institute for International Studies at Brown University, the memoirs cover the years from 1945 to 1956.

Surprisingly enough, the man who emerges in these pages hardly conforms to the boorish image he conveyed. Judging by the sentiments expressed here, he is anything but an anti-Semite. Indeed, he comes across almost as a closet philo-Semite, which, considering his actual record, is strange.

"I have never been an anti-Semite," he boldly claims, setting the measured tone that infuses these memoirs.

In a reference to the Ukrainian town where he lived after the age of 14, he writes: "In Yuzovka I lived and worked with Jews. I had many friends among the Jews. When I was just a kid, I worked in a factory with a Jewish man named Yakov Isaakovich Kutikov – a fine fellow… I was his helper… There are [good people like that, and there are] scoundrels in every nationality, whether Russian or Jewish or what have you."

Nikita Khrushchev in 1962

Khrushchev fingers Stalin as an arch anti-Semite.

"A hostile attitude toward the Jewish nation was a major shortcoming of Stalin's," he observes. "In his speeches and writings… there wasn't even a hint of this. God forbid that anyone assert that a statement by him smacked of anti-Semitism. Outwardly everything looked correct and proper. But in his inner circle, when he had occasion to speak about some Jewish person, he always used an emphatically distorted pronunciation."

When Stalin heard that the ringleaders of a labour slowdown in a Moscow aircraft factory were Jews, he blurted out, "Some healthy elements among the workers need to be organized. Let them take clubs and… give these Jews a beating."

Khrushchev professes to have been shocked by Stalin's outburst. "I listened to him and thought to myself: 'What is he saying? How could this be?'"

From this indignant reflection, he segues to a childhood memory of a pogrom in the Donbas region and recalls the sound of Cossack bugles and summons up a tableau of czarist police inciting workers against Jews.

"Later, many workers came to their senses and realized that all this was a provocation by the police and the authorities," he comments. "They came to understand that the Jews were not all enemies of the workers and that among the Jews there were participants and leaders of workers' strikes."

Claiming that the workers were remorseful that they had allowed the pogrom to occur, he says, "The whole thing was a terrible shame."

Denouncing anti-Semitism as "a poisonous and disgraceful matter," Khrushchev again returns to Stalin's dislike of Jews. "After the war Stalin frequently made anti-Semitic remarks during conversations, and we got used to them. We listened, but we didn't take them to heart."

In a passage brimming with anger, Khrushchev discloses that a Jewish doctor treating his son had been removed from her job. He reinstated her, but describes it up as "a shameful incident."

Then, without elaborating, he adds: "After that we held anti-Semitism back. But that's all we could do, just hold it back, because, unfortunately, elements of it have persisted."

He accuses Stalin of supporting and encouraging "the bacillus of anti-Semitism," saying that Stalin hypocritically opposed it in public.

Khrushchev says that when Stalin was required to issue a statement denying the existence of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union, he invariably recruited two Jewish lackeys: Ilya Ehrenburg, the journalist, and Lazar Kagonovich, the only Jew still sitting in the ruling Politburo.

Ruminating on the murder of Jewish theatre director Solomon Mikhoels, he says, "This is more than the mind can grasp! They made it appear as though he had fallen in front of a truck."

Khrushchev, furthermore, reveals that Stalin wanted Maxim Litvinov, the pre-war foreign minister, assassinated. "Stalin considered him a hostile element, an agent of America… The fact that he belonged to the Jewish nation was the second factor that played a role in this."

Although he passes over the blatant anti-Jewish aspects of the notorious Doctors' Plot, he voices gratification that "this whole case blew apart."

There are very few references to Israel, but when he dwells on the subject, he seems somewhat even-handed.

"In general our relations with Israel have been difficult. The Israelis have made many attempts to improve them, but we couldn't go along because of our friendship with the Arabs. How many times the Israeli ambassador asked that I receive him. I myself wanted to receive him, but I couldn't do it, because it would have infuriated the Arabs."

He adds that, since Israel supported American imperialism in the Middle East and the Soviet Union had no wish to alienate the Arab world, "we kept Israel at a distance."

But in a revealing aside, he concedes that since Israel was "no worse" than any other capitalist state, the Soviet Union should have established "normal relations" with it.

Readers will doubtless marvel at the gap between Khruschev's private musings and his public policies, particularly as they pertained to Jews and Israel.

Is it possible that he was really a decent man who simply lacked the courage of his convictions?

Who knows?

Book offers a handy guide to Jewish Spain

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Jewish Remnants in Spain: Wanderings in a Lost World* by Sidney David Markman. Scribe Publishing

Interior of Toledo's famous Synagogue of Santa Maria La Blanca, one of the few remaining Jewish houses of worship from medieval Spain, and one of many Jewish sites that Sidney Markman writes about in his book.

In the town of Trujillo, Spain, home of Francisco Pizarro and other conquistadors, there is a row of shops off the main square of special interest to Jewish travelers.

When I was there about 10 years ago, a pharmacist pointed to a door in his shop and invited me downstairs; there, I found an archway with a Hebrew inscription that had been only recently uncovered during renovations.

Similar finds in neighboring shops indicated there had once been a synagogue down below, possibly dating to the time of the expulsion (or shortly thereafter). Later, on a nearby street, a kerchiefed peasant woman pointed out an indentation in a doorpost where a mezuzah had been long imbedded and only recently removed. These were but two of many Judaic discoveries revealed to me during a leisurely motor trip through the picturesque Estramadura province of Spain.

Before that memorable trip, I had sought high and low for a good guidebook to Jewish Spain. To my surprise, I found nothing adequate. I would have been thrilled if Markman's book – a well-written, personalized chronicle of his pursuit of Jewish relics in 25 pre-expulsion towns – had been available then.

While Markman began his research with an academic posting as a Fulbright scholar in 1961, the research holds up wonderfully. A former professor of art history and archeology at Duke University – he is now, at age 95, professor emeritus – Markman's interest lay in the relationship between Spanish architecture and the architecture of Central America, a subject on which he had already written two books.

His interest in Judaic Spain was piqued by an encounter with Toledo's famous Synagogue of Santa Maria La Blanca, which has been converted into a church bearing the name of the Holy Virgin Mary. "On my first visit to Toledo," he writes, "I almost walked right by, not suspecting that just beyond the high courtyard wall one of the few remaining Jewish houses of worship of medieval Spain stood, almost intact."

Markman's original photographs and floorplans enhance the text, which is enlivened by the flavour of personal adventure and discovery. In the town of Zamora, for example, he finds the remnants of a synagogue in what had become an automotive garage.

"Squeezing by the ancient automobile parked in the door, I entered the garage. There in the irreverent atmosphere of grease and oil, with the bowels of internal combustion engines and tools strewn about in anarchic Spanish disarray, a massive stone wall extended only part way, like a peninsula, across the rooms at the rear. The medieval synagogue retained this wall as its only remaining vestige. I edged my way through the small opening to the left into the space behind what would have been the synagogue wall.

"Three grease-begrimed men were peering over a recently dissected automobile engine, each one doing something to bring the work along. They were huddled about the disemboweled engine in the very spot where centuries ago men huddled around and peered into the unrolled Torah scrolls to read the weekly portion of the Law early every Sabbath morning."

Markman's research focuses on the towns of Astorga, Bembibre, Zamora, Salamanca, Avila, Madrid, Segovia, Toledo, Cordoba, Ecija, Carmona, Alcala de Guadaira, Seville, Andalucia (region), Granada, Malaga, Lucena, Caceres, Plasencia, Bejar, Burgos, Vitoria, Gerona, Barcelona, Lerida, Zaragoza and Gibraltar. He began writing the book in the '80s, finished it in the '90s, and published it in 2003.

Jewish Remnants in Spain is a handy, highly readable softcover compilation of precise description, history and personal anecdote. I recommend it for anyone contemplating a trip to Spain and interested in that wonderful country's glorious Jewish past

Consultant helps others self-publish

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Many people have a book inside them that is waiting to be shared," says Lorne Miller, who has published a number of books on his own and has helped others publish their books.

To encourage people who want to write a book and don't know how, Miller recently published a book titled these days anyone can Write a Book!

It is a 180-page, step-by-step guide based on his experiences on his journey from writer to publisher. The book also includes stories by individuals whom he has assisted.

"I published my first book in 2001 when I was 59," Miller says. "After publishing three more books on my own, I decided to help others."

These days anyone can Write A Book! includes information about getting a book started, costs, cover design, editing, pictures and marketing.

Miller says that from time to time he places an announcement in this newspaper to help and encourage people who want to write a book.

"My phone rings off the hook," he says. "And one should not underestimate the importance of commercial viability of self-published books."

He gives as examples Roberts' Rules of Order and Huckleberry Finn, books that were originally self-published.

He says that some people want to share a personal memoir with their children and grandchildren; some want to express their appreciation to a special person; some want to write about a once-in-a-lifetime experience; and some want to write poetry or share their professional insights and experiences, while others want to write a novel.

"Whatever the reason that motivates each of us to write our own personal book," says Miller, "the written word is still the most effective way to leave a part of us to future generations."

He is pleased when people "unexpectedly" discover the satisfaction of writing their first book. "Their experiences illustrate the fact that these days anyone can write a book. They learn that their personal stories are worth recording," he says.

A fundraising consultant, Miller decided, in 1998, to collect the material he developed into a modest booklet to give out to his clients as a handout at his workshops, seminars and lectures.

"That sample booklet grew to become a 150-page, perfect-bound book titled Ensure the Future: How Synagogues and Day Schools Can Compete in the Philanthropic Marketplace. This book is still commercially available to the public," he says.

Miller will be giving a course on how to write and publish a book at the Jewish Public Library this spring.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

The Kinneret Trail will eventually encircle the only freshwater lake in Israel.

NATURE TRAIL TO FOLLOW SHORELINE OF SEA OF GALILEE

Israel's national planning council last month approved an initiative of the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI) to create a trail encircling the Kinneret – the Sea of Galilee – the country's only freshwater lake.

The SPNI has been fighting for years to restore the lakefront to public use. Although large sections of the shoreline have been illegally fenced off, Israel's government agencies have turned a blind eye to the problem for years. But the Israel Land Authority and the Ministry of Interior Affairs have now taken most of the illegal building to the courts.

The government is expected to invest several million NIS to develop the Kinneret Trail. It has also embarked on a cleanup campaign of the Kinneret shore and called for proposals for an educational program for children living in the Kinneret basin. For further details, please visit the website, www.aspni.org.

Meanwhile, some 4,000 runners participated in the 30th International Tiberias Marathon on Jan. 4, running courses of either six or 26 miles, partially along the Kinneret waterfront. Prize moneys totaled more than $100,000 (US).

At the Israel Museum: A new exhibition – "Age of Innocence: Portraying Children in the European Tradition" – explores depictions of childhood in some 40 paintings, sculptures, drawings, prints and photographs, mostly drawn from the museum's own collection.

The works reflect the evolving roles of children and changing attitudes toward them in European culture over the last five centuries. Artists include Pieter Brueghel the Younger, Bartholomeo Schidone, Pierre Auguste Renoir, Pablo Picasso, Käthe Kollwitz, Lewis Carroll and Max Liebermann. On view through June. 972-2-670-8935.

From Ancient Peru: Armchair travellers may be pleased to know that some 120 mostly gold objects unearthed from a Peruvian tomb are to go on display at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. The magnificent objects in "Ancient Peru Unearthed: Golden Treasures of a Lost Civilization" include ceremonial regalia, headdresses, jewelry and ornaments. This touring exhibition gives North Americans a first look at the artifacts, the little-known civilization that produced them, and the unique circumstances of their discovery. Opens March 10.

Canada's Afghanistan Mission: The Canadian War Museum in Ottawa is preparing a groundbreaking new exhibition on Canada's participation in the international security mission in Afghanistan.

"Afghanistan: A Glimpse of War" illuminates the subject through personal accounts collected by journalists in the field, detailing Canada's involvement in the "war on terror" and in the rebuilding of a country shattered by years of conflict.

"By presenting an exhibition that deals with such an important and timely issue, the war museum hopes it will help Canadians see that history is dynamic and that it is being shaped every day," said Joe Geurts, museum director and CEO. The exhibition opens Feb. 9 and runs until early 2008.

Israel sends another movie downer to Oscars

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

Israel's Sweet Mud a largely somber story of a youngster growing up on a kibbutz, and Holland's Black Book, a thriller about a Jewish woman battling the Nazis as a resistance fighter, are among movies from 61 countries vying for best foreign-language film honours in this year's Oscar race.

Director Dror Shaul based Sweet Mud on his own experiences as a young boy in the 1970s living on a left-wing kibbutz in the northern Negev.

For those of us raised with images of the kibbutz as a utopian ideal, representing the very best of Israel and the embodiment of the "new Jew," this film, for all its artistic virtues, is a downer.

Twelve-year-old Dvir, heart-wrenchingly portrayed by Tomer Steinhof, spends his nights in a communal dormitory and the evening hours with his beautiful young mother, Miri (Ronit Yudkevitz).

His father died under mysterious circumstances, his older brother is leaving for the army, and Dvir is left as the only real companion for his mother, who balances precariously on the edge of insanity.

Though Sweet Mud has considerable artistic merit, it continues the tradition by the Israel Academy of Films of selecting the most self-critical and downbeat protrayals of its society to compete in the Oscars.

Between caring for his mother and trying to find her a husband, preparing for his bar mitzvah, and wrestling with adolescence and the first pangs of love, Dvir carries a heavy load.

There are some relieving flashes of humour, none funnier than when a young, flustered female teacher tries to explain sex to the just-awakening kibbutz boys and girls.

But the underlying tragedy of Dvir's young years is that for all of its professed idealism, the kibbutz's indifference or insensitivity to his mother's plight leaves her to wrestle alone with her demons.

Sweet Mud, or Adama Meshugaat in Hebrew, has considerable artistic merit, but continues the tradition by the Israel Academy of Films of selecting the most self-critical and downbeat portrayals of its society to compete in the Oscar races.

Last year it was the self-lacerating What a Wonderful Place, which featured a sordid lineup of Israelis who pimp and rape imported Russian prostitutes, brutalize their foreign workers, cheat on their spouses, humiliate their children and commit suicide.

The quality of Israeli films has improved markedly in the past decade – Walk on Water and Yossi & Jagger are notable examples – and the willingness of Israeli filmmakers to take on their society's shortcomings puts Hollywood to shame.

But someone needs to tell the Israeli academy that a large proportion of Oscar judges are American Jews, who may not all be ardent Zionists but who resent heavy-handed portrayals of most Israeli Jews as all-around low lives at worst, or uncaring human being at best.

So it's little wonder that no Israeli film has ever won an Oscar and the last time the country placed among the five final nominees was in 1984.

JTA noted this point to Shaul, 36, during a phone interview.

"We can't be expected to make films in order to please others," he said.

From an artist's point of view he may be right, but now that Israel has garnered its first Olympic gold medal, it would be nice to see an Israeli producer clutch one of the golden statuettes on Academy Awards night.

Black Book marks the return of Dutch director Paul Verhoeven (Total Recall, Basic Instinct) to his native land, and he has chosen to depict his countrymen under Nazi occupation during the last year of World War II.

The central figure is a beautiful Dutch-Jewish cabaret singer, Rachel Stein (Carice van Houten), who after seeing her parents gunned down by Wehrmacht soldiers joins a resistance cell.

She is assigned the task of seducing the chief of SS intelligence in Amsterdam, but then falls under suspicion of betraying her resistance comrades.

What makes Black Book truly notable is Verhoeven's unblinkered view of his countrymen during the Nazi occupation.

Contrary to postwar legends, not all resistance fighters were unblemished heroes. Even strong men and women could break, old political quarrels continued and some would betray their comrades for money or safety.

Even more surprising, the film pulls no punches in showing the widespread anti-Semitism in the land of Anne Frank, even among those who resisted the Germans.

Thus, a farming family hides Stein, but tells her: "If you Jews had listened to Jesus, you wouldn't be in this situation."

At another point, when resistance cell members discuss whether Stein betrayed them, one opines: "You can never trust a Jew."

This year's foreign-language film competition is made tougher by entries from an unlisted 62nd country, the United States.

One is Mel Gibson's Yucatec-language Apocalypto. The other is Clint Eastwood's Letters from Iwo Jima, which is entirely in Japanese.

The nominations will be announced Jan. 23; the Academy Awards ceremony will take place Feb. 25.

Freedom Writers speaks truth, Hollywood style

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

In the fall of 1994, citizens of Los Angeles were still dealing with the bitter, racial disharmony sparked by the Rodney King riots two years before.

Freedom Writers, a movie directed by Richard LaGravenese and starring Hilary Swank, Patrick Dempsey, Imelda Staunton, Scott Glenn and April L. Hernandez, not only puts the viewer into this era, but into another arena always rife with tension, the high school classroom.

The film, now playing across the country, is based on the true story of Erin Gruwell, a young, privileged, white, rookie high school teacher, who inspired 150 racially diverse and acrimonious students at Woodrow Wilson High School in Long Beach, Calif., to lay down ethnic rivalries and take up the pen.

A cynical school administration had written off these kids as de facto failures and expected Gruwell to botch her bid to reform their gangsterish ways.

She proved everyone wrong.

Abandoning the prescribed curriculum, Gruwell instead encouraged her students to unload their feelings about the desperation and hopelessness in their urban lives via diary entries.

The teens were skeptical and resisted her ideas at first, fluffing her off as just another misguided and insincere white teacher, but Gruwell found an original method to quell their opposition: the Holocaust.

Though she is not Jewish herself, some of Gruwell's literary heroes include Elie Wiesel and Anne Frank.

During one poignant class, reflected in the movie's cathartic scene, Gruwell discovered that her students had no knowledge of the Holocaust. Her reaction? She made them read Wiesel's Night and Frank's The Diary of a Young Girl.

Teacher made her students read Wiesel's Night and Frank's The Diary of a Young Girl

The results were revelatory.

Her students instantly recognized themselves in the protagonists of both books and their hardened, streetwise exteriors slowly crumbled to allow hope and inspiration into their lives.

Their subsequent diary entries were compiled and turned into a book in 1999, The Freedom Writers Diary.

The name "Freedom Writers" was chosen in tribute to the "Freedom Riders", the civil rights group of the 1960s that fought against lingering racial segregation in the U.S. south.

Inspired by their insights and freshly discovered feelings of hope, Gruwell's class raised funds for visits to the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. and to fly in some very special guest speakers, such as Miep Gies, the Dutch woman who harboured the Frank family and Zlata Filipovic, the young girl who lived through the war in Sarajevo and chronicled Zlata's Diary: A Child's Life in Sarajevo.

After graduation, many of Gruwell's students went on to college and some became teachers themselves, to impart their knowledge to a new generation of inner city kids.

At least, that's how the real life story unfolded.

But as with any retelling by Hollywood, there are bound to be some liberties taken for the sake of melodrama, and Freedom Writers is no exception.

Gruwell has always maintained she wanted Swank to play her on screen. And the Oscar-winning actress does her part well, alternating between Gruwell's empowering, "can-do-in-the-classroom" perkiness and her slowly crumbling marriage outside of it.

In the end, movie's schmaltzy messages come through loud and clear

The movie is filled with many scenes that work hard to tug at the heartstrings, and they do to some extent.

The talks by Holocaust survivors, the visit by Gies, played with eerie genuineness by Pat Caroll, the trip to the Holocaust Museum and the numerous, heart wrenching voice-overs read by students from real diary entries are all indeed powerful.

But the producers also chose to overlay many scenes with the pumping, hard-edged hip-hop music of the day. While this could serve as a further marker for the era in which the movie is set, it denied the audience a chance to fully absorb and contemplate some moments that could have been more affecting.

That aside, Freedom Writers is well-acted and the ensemble cast of actors playing students and administrators do a good job of playing counterpoint to Swank's character as she evolves from naïve do-gooder to determined, beloved teacher.

In the end, the important messages of combating racism, finding your voice, doing what's right and never giving up hope come through loud and clear. Sure it's schmaltzy, but it's true.

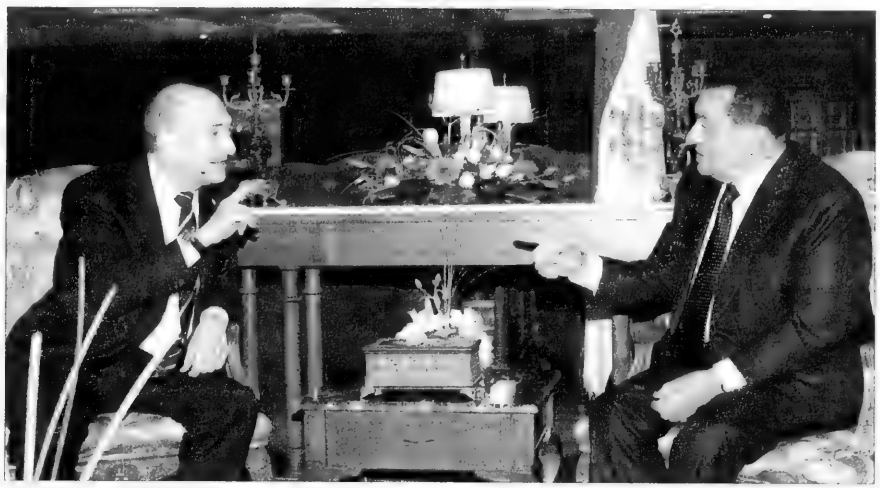
Israel & the Jewish World



FRIENDLY FINGER-POINTING: Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week in the Egyptian Sinai resort town of Sharm el Sheikh. Olmert had hoped to get Mubarak's support on a number of important regional issues, including the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit. The meeting, however, reportedly did not go well. It was overshadowed by a military clash the same day in Ramallah between the Israel Defence Forces and Palestinian fighters in which four Palestinian civilians were killed. [Israel Sun photo]

Student fencer finds her moxie

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

There's a scene in the 1987 comedy The Princess Bride where two master swordsmen duel while complimenting each other on their respective prowess with the blade.

Toward the end of the battle, one of the duellists, clearly losing and about to be eviscerated, comments to his rival, "I admit it – you are better than I am."

The apparent victor responds, "Then why are you smiling?"

To which the former answers, "Because I know something you don't know."

"And what is that?" asks the first swordsman.

"I am not left-handed," says the second, switching his sword hand and turning the tide of battle in his favour.

Talia Newman giggles furiously as she recalls the scene in one of her all-time favourite movies.

"My coach did that to me once," she chuckled.

The ebullient, 17-year-old Toronto high school student has been fencing since she was 11 and doing so competitively for the last two years.

"You don't have to be one of those silly, suave, Spanish fencing-masters like you see in the movies," she said laughingly. "But it is one of the best sports in the entire world. OK, maybe I'm a little biased."

Newman first fell in love with the sport through books and film.

"Ever since I was little, I liked the Three Musketeers and exciting stories [like that]," she said. "My mom asked me if I wanted to try fencing. I didn't know what that was. But when she explained to me that it was swordfighting, I just got so excited."

Newman's parents, Maggie and Elie, soon enrolled her in the Bladeworks fencing club and she took to it like a natural.

Over the years, she has become adept at the sport, and relishes learning the intricacies of its footwork and bladework.

"I'm a perfectionist," she said.

She once placed as high as ninth on the Ontario Fencing Association's provincial rankings and could have gone higher if not for her religious beliefs.

"Sometimes I have to miss tournaments because of holidays, and so I slip in the rankings," she said. "But that doesn't upset me. I won't fence on Yom Kippur or Passover."

As far as she knows, she is one of the few Jews practising the sport competitively in Ontario.

Still, Newman says fencing has enriched her life physically and emotionally.

"It really exercises your brain [because] you have to stay sharp," she said. "And fencers learn how to read people. You have to watch for actions and reactions. It's taught me to steer away from B.S. in life, because I learned to focus on what's important."

By her own admission, Bladeworks is a smaller, less competitive club that focuses more on fun than on hard-core training, she said.

Outside the "piste," the two-metre wide and 14 metre long thin strip of floor where fencers do combat, Newman is a self-described shy, sweet and unassuming girl.

However, once Newman dons her fencing mask and grabs a sword at a tournament, any sense of fun quickly evaporates, as she morphs into a warrior.

Once she's engaged in a match, all bets are off.

"When I first started, I was just this nice kid, I didn't want to hurt anybody," Newman said. "But [since] I started fencing in tournaments… that brought out my aggressiveness."

The three main weapons in fencing are the foil, the thinnest; the épée, the stiffest; and the sabre, which is the shortest.

Each sword requires a different strategy when in use.

Newman prefers the foil, enjoying the precise tactics and skills necessary to master that particular sword.

Though she trains three times a week after school and attends tournaments across the province, Newman doesn't do it for the accolades or because she wants to become a pro.

Aside from getting a terrific workout, her motivation is mostly about connecting with her dad.

As the youngest of three children, Newman cherishes the exclusive time she spends with her father through the relationship they've forged around fencing.

"My mom is at home and always takes care of the family, but since my dad is at work a lot and I don't get to see him as much, [fencing] is a real bonding experience," she said.

Her father takes her to tournaments and Newman relishes hanging out with him on their long drives.

"We listen to his CDs and mine on the trips… and I talk to him the whole time," she said.

Now in her last year at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Newman must soon decide which university to attend.

She's vacillating between McGill University and the University of Toronto.

But fencing will remain an integral part of her life, regardless of her destination.

"I'll definitely join the fencing club at whichever university I go to," she said.

"And if they don't have one, I'm gonna start one."

Moving in with the boyfriend

Sandie Benitah
20Something

It's been exactly a year since I ventured south of Steeles Avenue in search of my independence. Now, I'm ready for a babysitter again.

Now that I have experienced living in a basement apartment, I feel as strong as Xena, the Warrior Princess. After all, for the past 365 days, I have battled an endless amount of centipedes, earwigs and other critters. I only cried once after opening my closet door one morning and finding an earwig comfortably nestled in my favourite shirt. I was ready to call it quits then, but I moved on. I just never wore that shirt again.

I learned a lot, too. For instance, who knew that a grease fire could easily be put out with baking soda? I found out from my somewhat amused landlord and a team of firemen after I called the fire department in a panic asking them to rush over to save us.

It's definitely been a trying year as I tried over and over again to make it feel like home. I never did end up feeling that way about my first apartment, but now I'm willing to try again, this time with someone who I just might convince to do all the icky stuff for me.

I'm moving in with my longtime boyfriend.

It wasn't an easy decision to make, but I'm glad I made it either way.

Moving in with someone I care about I'm sure will come with its own set of challenges, some much scarier than a bug here or there.

For instance, it's not as if I've been able to hide this absurd Nutella addiction of mine, but he doesn't really know my Nutella routine.

Although I've already had it for breakfast, there's nothing I look forward to more than coming home after a long day, sitting on the couch with my feet up, a jar of Nutella in one hand and a spoon in the other while watching consecutive episodes of Law and Order on TV. I don't even want to talk to anyone when I'm in this state.

Will he laugh at me when he realizes how much I like to sing off-key to Britney Spears and dance when I'm getting dressed in the morning. I know they say you're supposed to dance like no one's watching, but now someone will be watching all the time.

Also, does he realize how spoiled I am?

As the youngest in my family, I've never had to share a single toy, never mind an entire bedroom or closet. The words "compromise" and "no" are not ones that I am accustomed to using, never mind listening to. I tried warning him and even suggested we get a two-bedroom apartment instead of one.

It's a good thing that he's a middle child, he pointed out. He's already used to babysitting the baby of the family.

I tried to scare him away by inviting him over for dinner one night, just so he knew exactly what he was getting himself into. I didn't want him to expect gourmet meals every night, but nonetheless I tried my best and decided to try something other than my usual hamburger and french fries meal.

I made mashed potatoes and pasta and even attempted a Betty Crocker cake for dessert. He ate it all and said he liked it. But I knew the truth when for Chanukah he gave me a couple of cookbooks.

I also knew he was pretty special when with a second glance, I noticed one of those cookbooks was on making chocolate cake and other desserts. I knew then that he'd accepted me and my absurd chocoholic-ness.

In fact, everything he gave me for Chanukah proved that I had nothing to fear. This guy knows exactly what he's getting into, I thought as I unwrapped a mock street sign that said "Princess Ave."

"Just so I won't forget," he joked.

He also gave me a stereo with a special plug for my iPod.

"That way we can dance together," he said.

I also unwrapped a warning, I presume.

My last gift was an air freshener, with "boys are smelly" scrawled on it.

I looked at him, but he just shrugged.

I nodded as I immediately understood I'm not the only one worried about moving in together.

TO DIE FOR CHOCOLATE CAKE

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

About five years ago, I met and fell in love with Harvey. We were both freshly divorced and supported each other through some difficult adjustments. We are now engaged to be married.

Harvey has two lovely teenage girls who at times can be a handful. I try to stay out of disciplining them, as they have two parents to do that job. However, now they will be under my roof for at least part of the time. Although I have raised two kids of my own, I am uncomfortable about disciplining Harvey's kids. I know first hand how manipulative some teens can be. Harvey and I have discussed my role as a step-parent and he says he trusts me to make the right decisions, but this hasn't been tested yet.

Any advice would be appreciated.

How Far Should I Go . .

Dear How Far Should I Go,

You are absolutely right to be cautious. It's time for a family meeting, and I don't mean only with Harvey. I'm not sure what Harvey's relationship is with his ex, but if you could all work together, things would run a lot more smoothly. You all need to sit down with the girls, explain the living arrangements and make them aware of what to expect.

I believe if you have a good relationship with them and there is mutual respect, you will get through this more easily.

With Harvey's support and a little practice, the girls will soon know the ground rules and will push only as far as you allow them to. Be consistent, fair, respectful and positive; however, when all else fails, you may need to apply appropriate consequences for unacceptable behaviour.

If the girls sense a weakness in the family link, they will use it, so it's very important that you are all on the same page and the ground rules are laid out before problems arise. Always keep the lines of communication open and talk things out as they emerge.

Without doubt, there will be an adjustment period where you are all feeling out each other's boundaries and limitations, but with love and consistency, you will have a second round with a loving family.

Buenos Aires: the suffering "Paris"

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The following is an excerpt from my journal:

Dec. 28, 2006 – I am in Argentina on a humanitarian trip through Ve'ahavta. I am sitting in a café in Buenos Aires being entertained by a seven-year-old boy who is expertly juggling three balls. He tosses them high in the sky and then catches one on the back of his neck while managing the other two with the finesse of a circus entertainer.

URBAN WRITER

I am impressed with his confidence and talent and give him five pesos. Another minute passes and a little girl of perhaps four years old approaches my table and hands me a card with a Spanish love poem. I give her five pesos.

This type of interaction with Argentina's poor will continue throughout the night. It always does. I am stymied by how much to give and how often. The situation is different from back home. It is endless here. In Toronto, I can cross the street if I decide not to give a homeless person a coin. But, in Buenos Aires, the other side of the street is a domicile to more desperate people. What do I do?

I am struck by the contradictions that exist in Buenos Aires. The city is bustling with life and lives up to its title of the "Paris" of Latin America through its architectural grandeur and the spirit one finds in the many commercial courtyards.

Yet unemployment has continued to skyrocket since the economic downturn in early 2000 and poverty grows every day. The Jewish community, about 250,000 people, is shrinking as more of its members decide that Israel, the United States or Winnipeg offer more hope for a decent future. It must be terrible to watch your community get smaller as your friends and family leave, and leave you behind.

Today, I visited a shantytown a few blocks away from a strip of five-star hotels. I walked through with Ricardo, an employee of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). He is working with a contractor to build a $1,500 "home" for a single mother of eight children. A Jewish community member donated the money. The boundaries of the house have been mapped out. It is no bigger than my office. The mother, however, is excited, as it is hers.

Later on this afternoon, I dropped into Baby Help, a program the JDC set up to help pregnant women and mothers of young children to supply them with the basic necessities to raise healthy Jewish children. I arrived when the children were napping and watched in amazement as they slept so peacefully. Many of these sweet children were from very impoverished homes and if not for Baby Help would eat one, perhaps two meals a day. Silently, I thanked God for my baby's health and his luck at having been born in Toronto.

I am saddened by many of the Jewish community professionals I have met with. Some of them were in the AMIA (the Jewish federation) building when it was bombed in 1994 and lost friends and colleagues. Others carry with them the horrendous memories of the terrorist attack on the Israeli embassy in 1992, and the brutal dictatorship between 1976 and 1983, a time when many of their friends were "disappeared" by the military junta.

I am deeply impressed with their eloquence, however, and their commitment to maintain an infrastructure that could collapse any time as government corruption and short-sighted economic policies are choking the country and its citizens' willingness to fight.

Another little boy approaches my table. His blazing brown eyes reflect a street wisdom he should not have. He is squeezing a fur toy, making it beep, and I simply don't know what to do. He couldn't be more than five.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was in China last week for a state visit to the country that served as a refuge for his family in the early part of the last century. Inset, Olmert visits the Great Wall.

Olmert goes to China, discusses Iran

By DAN BARON
JTA

BEIJING — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in Beijing Jan. 9 for a three-day official visit aimed at bolstering already burgeoning 15-year-old ties and, more discreetly, at lobbying for a stronger Chinese stand against Iran's nuclear program.

Even though annual Israeli-Chinese trade has risen to $3 billion (US), Olmert anticipated a tough time persuading President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao to abandon their circumspection vis-a-vis Tehran, given the Asian superpower's bottomless thirst for Iranian oil.

Nevertheless, Olmert said he and Wen had a "deep" discussion on Tehran during a Jan. 10 meeting, in which Wen said "surprising things, things both positive and unexpected," Reuters reported.

The Chinese premier reiterated his country's support for United Nations sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, saying they "showed the international concern over the Iran nuclear issue," Chinese state television reported. He added that "China will continue to play a constructive role in promoting the settlement of the issue."

At the end of his visit, on Jan. 11, Olmert met with Chinese President Hu Jintao. Their talks centred on economic ties between Israel and China, as well as the Iranian nuclear threat.

Asylum seekers 'deliberately mislead'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In the wake of news reports that the Immigration and Refugee Board is investigating how immigrant children are treated in Israel, the Israeli Embassy expressed anger last week at Israeli refugee claimants for "deliberately misleading" the Canadian agency.

A Dec. 31 story in Ha'aretz said that in order to evaluate refugee claims from Israelis alleging persecution in the Jewish state, the IRB recently sent a letter to Israel's National Council for the Child (NCC) asking whether immigrant children from the former Soviet Union face societal abuse or explicit state harassment.

Embassy reacts to report that IRB is checking conditions in Israel

The Ha'aretz report said that 679 Israelis sought asylum outside the country in 2005, and many of those claims were made in Canada by ex-citizens of the former Soviet Union.

Statistics released to The CJN show that 369 Israeli refugee claimant cases were referred to the IRB from January to September 2006, and 91 of those were granted refugee status.

But officials at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa say the claims are spurious.

"Israel is a democracy that regards successful immigrants' absorption as a prime value. It is unfortunate that some Israeli citizens who were seeking to immigrate to Canada have opted for submitting bogus claims for asylum here, thus deliberately misleading

More Graffiti Found

MONTREAL — Vandals struck Congregation Chevra Kadisha-B'nai Jacob-Beit Hazikaron in Montreal's Snowdon area and a residence a few doors away in the early morning of Jan. 4. The phrase "Snowdon Al-Axsa" was spray-painted in red on the synagogue's front wall, an apparent reference to the Palestinian Fatah Party's terrorist faction, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade. The incident came after other graffiti, including at the Jewish Community Campus and another Snowdon shul, appeared over the holiday period. Police were not initially calling the latest attack a hate crime.

Flu Cancels Surgeries

MONTREAL — Montreal's Jewish General Hospital (JGH) last week indefinitely cancelled elective surgeries that require hospitalization after an outbreak there of viral gastroenteritis, an infection that causes nausea, vomiting and diarrhea. "Viral gastroenteritis usually runs its course in approximately 24 to 72 hours and is the same type of 'stomach flu' that sometimes spreads quickly through schools, day-care centres, offices or cruise ships and then disappears," said Dr. Mark Miller, head of infection prevention and control at JGH. He said visitors and people needing non-critical medical attention should avoid JGH.

Boys Seek Record

TORONTO — Boys from B'nai Brith Youth Organization in Toronto will try to break the Guinness world record for longest indoor floor hockey marathon. The event will start Sat., April 24, at 8 p.m. and run until April 25 at 9 p.m. – or beyond. The record of 24 consecutive hours is held by a BBYO chapter in Edmonton. BBYO needs volunteers to donate four hours of time to witness the record attempt. For details, call 416-398-2004.

WORLD

Scholar Studied Cda.

WASHINGTON — Prominent U.S. political sociologist Seymour Martin Lipset – whose classic book, Agrarian Socialism, studied the rise of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation in Saskatchewan – died Dec. 31 at 84 in Virginia after health troubles due to a stroke. In addition to studying U.S. democracy, Lipset was also interested in differences between Canada and the United States, and especially why the latter never developed a strong socialist movement. His 1989 book, Continental Divide, explored the subject in detail.

Yiddishist Dies at 102

NEW YORK — Itche Goldberg, a Polish-born left-wing activist who once lived in Toronto and was a longtime teacher of Yiddish, died Dec. 27 in New York of cancer at 102. In 1920, he came to Toronto, where he studied philosophy and political science at McMaster University and taught Yiddish at the Workmen's Circle/Arbeter Ring school. He later moved to the United States and taught in New York and Philadelphia at schools linked to the communist International Workers Order, which had splintered from the Workmen's Circle. He also edited Yiddish journals and published Yiddishe Kultur, a literary magazine, from 1964 until its demise in 2004.

Teens See Frank Home

AMSTERDAM — Ten Belgian youths of Turkish descent convicted of an anti-Semitic attack visited the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam. The youths threw stones and shouted anti-Semitic slogans at a group of chassidic teens visiting an eastern Belgian town in November. Sentenced to 30 hours of community service, they were also invited to Anne Frank House by Belgian cabinet minister Peter Vanvelthoven, who joined them on the visit. He said he hoped "to encourage these youths to respect the Jewish people."

EU Gets Extreme Right-Wing Caucus

BRUSSELS — Extreme-right parties in the European Parliament are forming a caucus.

The Guardian reported Jan. 8 that the accession of Romania and Bulgaria this month to the European Union enabled the group's formation. Under Parliament rules, a minimum of 19 parliamentarians from at least five countries are needed for the creation of a political group.

The group expects the Bulgarian member of the Attack Party and the Romanian members of the Greater Romania Party, both of which are known for their anti-Roma, or Gypsy, and racist stances, to join.

The faction will be led by French National Front member Bruno Gollnisch, who is awaiting a court verdict on charges of Holocaust denial. It also would include Alessandra Mussolini, granddaughter of Italian dictator Benito Mussolini, and Andreas Moelzer, former adviser to far-right Austrian politician Joerg Haider.

By forming a caucus, the group – to be called Identity, Sovereignty and Transparency – can get EU funding and easier access to leadership positions in the Parliament.

Orthodox man begins new life as a woman

By MEIRA MAIEROVITZ DRAZIN
JTA

Mordechai's community and friends are still adjusting to his decision to become Nicole – some better than others.

Mordechai used to be known in his Toronto Orthodox community as Nord, short for Nord the Barbarian, which referred to his girth and hairiness. He now wishes to be called Nicole, and has chosen Neshama, or Soul, as a Hebrew name.

When abba becomes ima
please see page 41

Nicole would like to remain part of the community.

"My earliest memory is crying myself to sleep, wishing and hoping and praying to God that I would wake up a girl," she said. "But I thought all boys must feel like that."

As she was growing up and attending boys' yeshivas, however, that hope "couldn't exist, so it got buried" – until right after her honeymoon three years ago.

"On a scale of 1 to 10, it went from 3 or 5 to 1,000," Nicole said of her gender dysphoria. "I couldn't function or focus on anything else. It became a very real threat to my life. When I got enough of a handle on it to tell [my wife] a few months later, we cried for hours. We cried a lot for 2½ years."

They searched for alternatives, including reorientation therapy with a psychiatrist affiliated with a group called Jews Offering New Alternatives to Homosexuality.

Last fall, however, Nicole began a trial on hormone therapy. In June, when it became clear that transition was inevitable – and the results of the hormones were becoming apparent – Mordechai gave his wife a get, or Jewish divorce, and started to live life as Nicole.

What has rocked the Toronto community, and is being followed closely in the transsexual community, is that rather than simply disappearing, Nicole has been open about her condition and is the first person to transition "in place" within an Orthodox community.

"Gender dysphoria is not something I chose, and for me transition is about survival, not comfort or happiness," Nicole said. "I believe that survival is a moral and halachic imperative, and I hoped my family and friends would want the opportunity to be here for me. I know it will take time. And I know some people won't want to deal with it. But I wasn't willing to write everybody else off."

Nicole would like to remain part of Toronto community

"It takes guts to transition, but something else to do it 'in place,'" said one Orthodox transwoman from the Midwest who uses the Internet pseudonym Beth Orens. "When I think about it, it gives me the willies. She's got courage that's completely unbelievable."

But Orens thinks Nicole might have been overly optimistic.

"On the one hand, to hell with people who are obnoxious. Everyone has the right to live their life," Orens said. "But people were horrendous on her blog, absolutely vile. They made everything into 'if you're sick, get some help, but don't expect us to cheer you on.' Or, 'people who tell you this is OK are not really your friend.'"

Nicole soon disabled the comments section of her online journal. What upset her most were comments from an anonymous source that were particularly harsh – and, it turned out, came from her sister.

Nicole's sister won't speak with her anymore, and her brother is apprehensive about seeing her. In deference to her family, Nicole wouldn't allow her last name to be used in this article.

Nicole described her parents as torn between their love and support for her as a person and their desire to limit her transition's impact on the family.

Proposed future agenda

From the editor's desk

Four years ago, the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) was created in Jerusalem. The brainchild of the Jewish Agency for Israel, the JPPPI is a think-tank that brings together scholars, researchers, public figures, lay and professional leaders, futurists and analysts whose mission is to annually assess the condition of the Jewish people and strive to look down the road, past the present and toward the next horizon.

The chairman of the JPPPI board is former U.S. Mideast Ambassador Dennis Ross. Yehezkel Dror, one of Israel's most distinguished policy strategists and foreward thinkers, is the institute's founding president. Both have been instrumental in the work of the institute.

The annual assessment for 2006 is titled Major Shifts – Threats and Opportunities. It is a profoundly interesting document. Thus, as I did last year, I shall use this space to highlight the institute's main recommendations this year for the strategic agenda and policy directions.

A great deal of thought has obviously been applied to the document and its recommendations. However, this year's assessment suffers from the fact that it appears to have been written before the war last summer that Israel fought with Iran, Syria and Hezbollah. For no mention of the war appears in the executive report, from which the following material is excerpted. Despite this very large lacuna in the document's context, however, there is still within it sufficient material of far-reaching import to command our attention.

"This, the third assessment," writes Ross in the foreword, "uses the concept of a 'delta,' or changes in direction or innovations or developments that can profoundly affect the Jewish people in general or in particular communities."

In the introduction and overview to the executive report, Dror elaborates upon the fulcrum term "delta."

"The deltas discussed focus in part on events and processes concentrated around 2005-06 and in part on developments within the last five years or so but becoming pronounced in 2005-06… But all deltas share two main features: they constitute a relatively sharp change in direction and are likely to have significant impacts on the future."

The institute, thus, suggests 10 strategic agenda items with policy directions "that require urgent consideration by Jewish organizations and leaders." They do not replace the strategic agenda and recommendations of the preceding two years. Rather, they add to them.

1. Israel-Diaspora relations

The institute offers eight discrete suggestions to upgrade the integration between Israel and the Diaspora to try to assure the unity of world Jewry. The issue has risen to the top of the agenda because for the first time in 2000 years, the largest Jewish community in the world resides in the State of Israel.

2. Demography

There are quantitative and qualitative aspects to demography. Quantitatively, a stable Jewish majority must be assured in Israel as well as a turnaround in the declining population of the Diaspora. Qualitatively, the report calls for the Jewish people "to become more of a learning knowledge society, important in terms of both Jewish values and human capital."

3. Assisting Israel in transformative choices

The planners suggest three ways the Jewish people could help Israel to cope with "transformative choices" such as "the mega-delta" radical change in territorial policies (as exemplarized in the withdrawal from Gaza).

4. Making cyberspace into a main instrument of Jewish people cohesion and thriving

The planners believe only a small part of cyberspace's potential is being used to achieve a broad sense of global Jewish peoplehood and unity.

5. Facilitation of grass roots initiatives

JPPPI notes the proliferation of grass roots movements and projects in many Jewish communities and urges their encouragement and harnessing of their dynamic potential.

6. Remembrance

The institute calls for novel forms of preserving and presenting the memory of the Shoah.

7. Developing "external relations" strategies

JPPPI identifies six broadly defined geo-political entities external to the Jewish people with whom new strategies of contacts and relations must be fashioned.

8. Strengthening action capacities

The institute calls for improving communities' abilities to implement the new policies that are required.

9. Rapidly upgrading capacities to cope with crisis

Because of a "significant probability" of violence against Jews worldwide, we must develop better systems to respond and cope with whatever unfolds.

10. Accelerate institutional and leadership innovation

The cumulative impact of these and the preceding two years' recommendations makes imperative a new, innovative approach to training Jewish leaders.

By proposing a strategic agenda for the Jewish people, the JPPPI, as Dror writes, is trying to help Jewish decision makers properly, effectively and quickly plan for the future. As he also writes, the situation is urgent and demands action now. –MBD

'Granting refugee status hurts Israel's image'

Canadian immigration authorities about their past in Israel and personal background," embassy spokesperson Ofir Gendelman wrote in a statement.

"The embassy has learned that in more than a few cases, refugee claimants who have stated that they were mistreated in Israel made this unsubstantiated claim only when they were in the process of being deported from Canada."

He went on to say that Israel "was established as a safe haven for persecuted Jews from all over the world. It is saddening to see that this fact is being blatantly ignored by people who would do anything to cynically promote their own selfish interests by smearing their homeland."

Israel made the IRB's Top 10 list of source countries for refugee protection claims for the first three quarters of 2006, along with China, Haiti, Sri Lanka and Nigeria, among others. It's the sixth time since 1989 that Israel has made the list.

Since 2000, the IRB has received almost 3,000 refugee status claims from Israelis.

While individual case details are protected by confidentiality laws, the fact that citizens of a democracy are being granted refugee status has exasperated Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

In October, Ynetnews.com quoted him as telling Canadian authorities that Israeli refugee claimants "are fooling you, and... granting refugee status hurts Israel's image and is an attempt at portraying it, wrongly, as a country in which people are persecuted."

On the IRB's website, sample rulings from Israeli cases reinforce the embassy's position.

In evaluating one Israeli claimant's testimony that the person feared inadequate state protection against terror bombings, a 2004 IRB tribunal determined that "it cannot be said that [Israel] is not using all the means at its disposal to protect them against what the claimant fears most... suicide attacks. According to documentary evidence, Israel is providing adequate protection for its citizens."

Another case study rejects an Israeli woman's claim that Israel provides no protection for abused women. The tribunal rejects this outright, citing numerous shelters and state resources clearly available to her there.

IRB spokesperson Melissa Anderson said that while her organization has given refugee status to some Israelis, it has also granted asylum to citizens of other democracies over the years, including some from the United States and Britain.

"But these [decisions] often turn on complex information," Anderson said. "It's difficult to draw any hard and fast conclusions about these [statistics]. Refugee determination is a very complex form of decision-making."

Anderson said that it's normal practice for the IRB to research conditions in a claimant's home country.

"Essentially, it is to support fair refugee protection determination," she said. "If we're doing research on a subject, it's because it's come up in a claim somewhere. There's probably been an allegation made in someone's personal information form."

In response to the IRB's inquiry, NCC executive director Yitzhak Kadman said that while children from the former Soviet Union may indeed encounter difficulties inherent in the process of immigrating to Israel, no state policies exist to persecute them.

"To make it easier for immigrant children and their families, a special ombudsman unit for immigrant children from the [former Soviet Union] was established many years ago," he wrote.

In his reply, Kadman admitted that immigrant children who don't have formal rights under Israel's Law of Return are "problematic," but he said Israel has offices to deal with them – namely, the ministries for immigrant absorption, education and social affairs.

He also made it clear to the IRB that it's "very rare" to find targeted prejudice by authorities against immigrant children or their families.

Museum conference set for Toronto

For the first time ever, the Council of American Jewish Museums is holding its annual conference in Canada.

The theme of the conference – which runs Jan. 21 to Jan. 24 in Toronto – is Place, Space, and Crossing Boundaries: Jewish Museums and their Cultural Landscapes.

Conference co-host is the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum at Beth Tzedec Congregation, which will be the site of the first day's events, including a keynote address by Arnold Eisen, chancellor-elect of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Day 2 of the conference, to be held downtown at the Courtyard by Marriott, begins with a plenary session on Recovering Memory in the Urban Landscape.

On Jan. 23, events will be held at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and will start with a look at the story of Toronto's Jewish community. Closing events will be held at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

The council, now celebrating its 30th anniversary, is committed to strengthening the Jewish museum field in North America. Through training of museum staff and volunteers, information exchange, and advocacy on behalf of Jewish museums, CAJM aims to help its institutional and individual members educate and inspire diverse audiences on all aspects of Jewish culture and history.

Federation control of Nadal JCC on agenda

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's role in the governance of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC), whose building it owns, was the subject of a sometimes heated discussion at a town hall meeting for centre members last week.

The issue has yet to be resolved, and no voting took place at the meeting, which was held at the JCC building at Bloor and Spadina.

Ted Sokolsky

A notice posted on the centre's website and in the building said the meeting would "discuss the proposed amendment to our bylaw making UJA Federation the sole voting member, which will serve to bring the relationship between the MNJCC and Federation in alignment with the other organizations that are part of the UJA Federation family."

However, that proposal was scrapped some time in the 48 hours before the meeting, according to Jacqueline Friedland, president of the JCC's 12-member board. No alternative plan has been adopted and the meeting ended without one.

Federation president Ted Sokolsky said the federation wants a "safety valve" in case a "rogue group" tries to take over the institution, but speakers said that scenario is only hypothetical and that there isn't any imminent problem.

Currently the only remedies in the case of a board takeover would be "extremely severe," Sokolsky told the approximately 40 people in attendance. "It would mean forcing the JCC into bankruptcy, closing it down, things we don't want to do."

In an interview after the meeting, federation spokesperson Howard English said there wasn't any catalyst for the gathering "aside from the fact that we wanted to protect the assets."

David Engel, chair of UJA Federation's board, said the federation wants "the right to look at the slate [for the board of directors] and the right to comment on the slate. We didn't believe it was a huge issue, because in the partnerships we've had in the past, it wasn't an issue at other organizations."

Sokolsky reminded members about the federation's considerable investment in the centre, including saving it from "near bankruptcy" in the mid-1990s, spending $18 million to rebuild it as part of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow campaign, and providing it with a $2.85 million operating loan.

Now, the federation wants to "ensure ownership of the building can never be lost," Sokolsky said.

"There are examples in the Jewish community of boards being taken over by people who don't believe in the original mandate of those institutions," he said, adding that the federation could have just "installed our own people."

"It's about trusting each other, not casting aspersions or making crazy accusations that people want to take over," he said.

David Engel

"People are concerned about membership rights," said board member Samuel Goldstein, a vociferous opponent of the original proposal who had threatened legal action after hearing about it and about the original early-morning, inconvenient time for the meeting.

The original timing of the meeting was arranged by the centre's board to try to accommodate people who were unavailable at other times, Friedland said. She insisted there was no malicious intent.

Goldstein, a criminal lawyer, maintained that the centre's current relationship with the federation doesn't need to be changed. "We are not an arm of the UJA. We look to their support, but we're a separate and distinct organization which has roots down here."

He said a complete board takeover is impossible because only five spots become available each year.

However, Jeffrey Hoffman, a lawyer whose spouse is on the JCC board and whose cousin is the federation's general counsel, said the federation's worst-case scenario is "something that can happen."

He cited a case from the late 1980s in the Serbian Orthodox community. "The church lost the community centre," he said. "I have no objection whatsoever to an owner saying, 'I want control of the board.'"

A nursery school parent at the meeting expressed anger over a lack of "transparency" in initial communications about proposed changes, and the federation's "rhetoric" regarding partnership.

"I have not heard a word that engenders any additional trust," he said, adding that sometimes it's good for a rogue group to take over, if it represents a "more progressive, inclusive, democratic or uplifting vision of what this institution should be."

"It sounds to me like the proposal creates the possibility of us losing some of our independence in exchange for protection," said one woman.

He must beat, not join them

That U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was on a tour of the Mideast this past weekend less than three months after she visited the region in the fall is an undoubted consequence of the re-invigorated Iraq strategy announced by her president, George W. Bush, last week in Washington. Effectively spurning the Baker-Hamilton recommendation to quickly devise a plausible exit strategy from Iraq, the American president announced, among other things, that he would soon send some 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to try to rout the insurgents and foreign fighters once and for all and to give one last chance to the quick-trigger, ethnically divided and constantly quarrelling Iraqis to try to govern themselves.

The United States is desperate to show the Arab world that it is making some progress in the Palestinians' conflict with the Israelis. Thus, Rice told the assembled media in Israel last weekend: "We are here in order to examine ways of continuing the existing momentum in Israeli-Palestinian relations."

Rice visited Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in Ramallah on Sunday and met with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem on Monday.

Talk of "continuing the existing momentum" however was more tragi-comic than it was narrative or explanatory. For the only momentum in the peace process is in the ongoing unilateral effort by the Israeli government to artificially augment Abbas in the eyes of his shoulder-shrugging, seemingly peace-indifferent people. But like an undersized child ill-suited to the roomy booster chair in which his parents persist in propping him, Abbas keeps sliding below the surface of his people's attention. His call to their pragmatic side, if not to their conscience and sense of morality, to turn away from violence does not seem to be resonating with a majority of his people.

According to the head of Israeli military intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, 77 Palestinian suicide bombers were arrested in 2006, 45 of whom were actually en route to carrying out their deadly missions. Yadlin told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week that militant Palestinian groups fired 1,200 Qassam rockets at Israel last year, 700 of which hit populated areas.

Despite the repeated rumours of the imminent formation of a unity government with Hamas, there cannot possibly be any "momentum" toward peace unless and until Hamas renounces its avowed purpose of resisting and undoing the "occupation."

For there to be an actual momentum toward peace, Abbas cannot join Hamas. He must beat them. Rice knows this very well. Hopefully that was the key message she imparted to her hosts last weekend in Ramallah.

Israel's cabinet decided to pay the equivalent of $262 million (US) to 730 Jewish families, mostly in the town of Yamit, who were slated to leave their homes in the Sinai by April 1982 as part of Israel's peace deal with Egypt. The amount represented about $100,000 for vacating an apartment and $230,000 for leaving a farm or business.

A word for the sheik

Filmmaker Barry Avrich was wined and dined on his trip to Dubai and states that he came away with a new appreciation for Arab culture ("A Jew on the jury of the Dubai film festival," perspectives, CJN, Jan. 4). He considered himself lucky to get an audience with Sheik Ahmed bin Saeed Al Maktoum. I wonder if he got to see the man-made lake in Dubai that has islands representing every country in the world except Israel. Perhaps next time Avrich sees the sheik, he can point out that the non-recognition of the existence of the State of Israel is indeed part of Arab culture.

Abbas not a 'moderate alternative'

In "A nuclear Iran seen as 'dangerous' for the world" (CJN, Jan. 4), Sheldon Kirshner quotes former U.S. ambassador Dennis Ross, who says that the West should support Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as a "moderate alternative" to Israel's Hamas government.

The Palestine Liberation Organization charter, under which Abbas and his Fatah party operate, continues to call for "the total liberation of Palestine" through "the armed Palestinian revolution." The media that Abbas controls continues its indoctrination of hatred of Jews and its denial of any historical connection between the Jewish people and the Land of Israel. Abbas himself, as well as his media, continues to glorify the murderers of Jews by shaheeds (Muslims who die during fulfilment of a religious commandment or during a war for the religion). Moreover, Abbas has never confronted the Arab world with the truth of the PLO's terror campaigns of the 1960s, '70s and '80s, with which he was intimately connected, nor has he denied the links between himself and the terrorist arm of his Fatah party, the Al-Asqa Martyrs Brigades.

Israeli leaders and friends of Israel should be demanding that Abbas stop the hatred, begin the process of truth-telling that alone could lead to reconciliation, stop his funding of terror groups and use the tens of thousands of his own well-armed forces to establish a lawful society rather than murdering and maiming Jews.

Peace cannot come by pretending that those who long for one's destruction are one's friends. Worse, by promoting Abbas and his party, Fatah, as "moderate," we destroy the possibility of Palestinian Arab society finally developing leaders who are truly uncompromised by terror.

Climate change

Global climate change is arguably the greatest current threat to humanity and one of today's greatest moral issues. Hence, it is essential that the Jewish community play an active role in responding, based on our obligations to protect human life and the environment.

Almost daily, there are new reports about record heat waves, widespread forest fires, an increase in the number and severity of storms, severe droughts, the melting of glaciers and polar ice caps and other indications of global climate change. Three reports in late December 2006 dramatized that global warming is occurring and that it is happening far faster than climate scientists once expected: (1) an inhabited Indian island was completely evacuated because it had been inundated by rising sea waters, leaving 10,000 people homeless; (2) a giant ice island (120 feet thick and 2,500 square miles in area) broke free from a Canadian Arctic ice shelf; (3) U.S. President George W. Bush's administration, which has been resistant to reacting to global warming, announced that polar bears are in jeopardy, mainly due to thinning ice, and moved to put them on the endangered list and to take steps to protect them.

Some renowned climate scientists, such as James Hansen of NASA, are warning that global climate change may reach a "tipping point" and spiral out of control within a decade, with disastrous consequences, if current conditions continue. No wonder that Time magazine announced its April 2006 special report on global warming with "Be Worried. Be Very Worried."

While generally overlooked, an important approach to reversing global warming is a shift toward plant-based diets. A Nov. 29, 2006, report from the UN Food and Agriculture Organization, Livestock's Long Shadow, points out that animal-based agriculture causes about 18 per cent of greenhouse emissions, an amount greater than that caused by all vehicles. In addition to helping to move our imperilled planet to a sustainable path, such a shift would reduce the epidemic of diseases afflicting the Jewish community, diminish the widespread mistreatment of billions of farmed animals and show the relevance of Judaism's eternal values to current threats.

French Jews make their choices in presidential elections

By BRETT KLINE
JTA

With the French presidential election three months away, conservative candidate Nicolas Sarkozy is gaining strength in the Jewish community.

But are voters being swayed by Sarkozy's strong support of Israel and tough stands on suburban violence and Islamic fundamentalism, or do they just not think much of his opponent, Ségolène Royal of the Socialist party?

"Usually I don't vote, but this time I am registering, and then I will vote for Sarkozy," said Michael Sebban, 38, a high school philosophy teacher and author of several novels. "But I am really voting against Ségolène Royal and the Socialist party because her grasp of international politics is bad for Israel."

Simy Bendahan, 45, a clothing manufacturer in Paris's heavily Jewish garment centre, says, "Everyone I know is voting for Nicolas Sarkozy, and I'm going to do the same.

"Usually I vote Socialist party," Bendahan said, "but Ségolène Royal knows nothing about foreign policy – about the Middle East, for example."

The April election takes place in two rounds. All candidates and political parties participate in the first round, with the two top vote-getters then facing off.

While the Gallic French are still talking about voting along party lines, observers say that more than in any other election, the country's 600,000 Jews are talking about voting against a candidate rather than supporting one – a vote de sanction, in French.

Sebban noted that Royal said she would talk with any official in another country who was elected democratically. In early December, she met with Hezbollah parliamentarians in Beirut during a Middle East tour that included talks with high-level Israeli officials and Palestinian leaders in the Gaza Strip.

"That looks great on paper, but first of all, in some countries, bad guys are being elected, such as the Hamas or [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad in Iran," Sebban said. "If she wants to talk to them, I will not vote for her."

On her Middle East tour, Royal was criticized for not immediately condemning a Hezbollah deputy in Beirut who equated Israel with the Nazis who occupied France. The next day, she called the remarks "unacceptable, abominable and odious," blaming her failure to speak out on a bad translation.

Ariane Warlin, business supplement editor at the left-leaning Le Monde newspaper, as well as an anchorwoman and talk-show host at TFJ, a French Jewish television station that recently went off the air, said she isn't so sure that there even is a Jewish vote, under normal conditions.

"But this time, large numbers of Jews say they are voting for Nicolas Sarkozy and the centre-right Union for a Popular Movement party," Warlin said. "He is clear about his support for Israel, and about cracking down on violence in the suburbs and on the rise of Islamic fundamentalism here."

As interior minister, Sarkozy took action against illegal residents in France, mostly from West Africa and Arab North Africa, Warlin said. A number were deported.

"Even people who were put off by his demagogic approach to the illegal residents situation have nobody else to turn to because Socialist party officials simply ignored the situation," Warlin said. "I am very tempted to vote for him also."

Sebban said Sarkozy is the only candidate, left or right, to recognize that French people are increasingly divided into different communities, including North African Arabs, Muslims, Jews, Africans and Asians.

As interior minister, Sarkozy has tried to address the needs of those communities, for example by forming a Muslim Council similar to the Jewish umbrella group, CRIF. However, that didn't sit well with many mainstream French.

"For many Gallic French, addressing different communities is the same as admitting the failure of what is called here the republican model, whereby all French citizens are considered to be the same and their origins are never mentioned, such as in polls or even crime reports," Sebban said.

"For many Jews it's the opposite," he continued. "They recognize themselves in this community identity, especially Jews from North Africa. They support Sarkozy because he openly talks about supporting Israel and about the insecurity Jews feel in certain suburbs when they have been victims of violence from young Arab neighbours.

Ségolène Royal with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem last month. [Isranet photos]

"For many mainstream French, both the aggressors and the victims are French and nothing more, but Jews know better than that, and so does Sarkozy," he went on. "Personally, I think the French are fools to think like that, but the bottom line is that they really don't give a damn."

Not everyone agrees.

"The young North Africans in troubled suburbs will stop burning cars or turning to radical Islam when they are given a chance to work," said Michel Lachkar, a television journalist of Moroccan Jewish origin and a former activist in extreme-left circles.

"As interior minister, Sarkozy has failed to do anything, in spite of all the tough talk," he said. "I think the Socialist party is better equipped to change the situation, and I think that Ségolène Royal is more interesting than she appears. I reason as a French person more than as a Jew on this."

Lachkar did say that Sarkozy's support for Israel represents a break with traditional right-wing policy.

"Rightist Gaullist politicians have always been pro-Arab in their Middle East policies," Lachkar said.

"Sarkozy is openly supportive of Israel and critical of Hamas and Hezbollah. Obviously that attracts many Jewish voters."

In a strange twist, far-right leader Jean Marie Le Pen, by virtue of his statements against Arabs in France, has attracted a small number of Jewish voters who have been victims of violence in certain suburbs.

"For the Jews who say they're voting National Front," Sebban said, "that just proves that even among us Jews, there are a few idiots."

In support of Sarkozy

Sitting in a fashionable cafe on Boulevard Saint Germain, Nicole Guedj, perhaps the key point person between French government circles and the Jewish community in France, wonders aloud, "Is there a Jewish vote?"

Her answer: "I don't think so."

But Guedj, a high-placed member of the campaign team for Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, was confident her candidate would fare well with French Jews even before Socialist party hopeful Ségolène Royal stumbled on her visit to the Middle East in early December.

Nicole Guedj

Royal stood by idly as a Hezbollah deputy in Beirut compared the Israelis to the Nazis who occupied France, waiting until the next day to condemn the remarks as "unacceptable, abominable and odious."

"Many people in the community were already convinced that Nicolas Sarkozy is the right person to be president of France," said Guedj, a former lawyer.

Guedj, 51, is a close associate not only of Sarkozy but also of President Jacques Chirac. The two men are political adversaries despite belonging to the same right-of-centre party, the Union for a Popular Movement, or UMP.

But Guedj's passions lie beyond French politics. Guedj, who has kosher meals delivered to staff in her office in the Elysée Palace (the presidential complex), is a steadfast defender of Israel. In 1996, she was one of the founders of Union of Jewish Patrons of France, a group of Jewish heads of French companies who meet to discuss French-Jewish and Israel-related matters, but do not lobby in the American sense of the word. There are no political lobbying groups in France.

Guedj has been criticized by politicians and the French public for her commitments to the Jewish community in France and Israel's security, and for her activity in French politics.

Since Israel's war with Hezbollah this summer, she has been worried about Israel and how it's viewed.

The July 2005 meeting in Paris between Chirac and then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon "was a real breakthrough in terms of Israel's image in France and in Europe," she said, "but since the war with Hezbollah, that image is once again that of an aggressor. Israeli politicians have had great difficulty convincing the world that the war was an act of self-defence."

Among French politicians, Sarkozy has the clearest position on Israel, Guedj says. "He has always been clear about needing to find solutions to the rise of radical Islam throughout the world, the violence of angry youths in the suburbs in France, and about Israel's right to defend itself against Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah in Lebanon," she said. "No Socialist party official can come close to Sarkozy in terms of his support for Israel."

Some French blamed Sarkozy for compounding, even provoking, violence in the French suburbs in November 2005, when thousands of young people, mostly of North African Arab and other African backgrounds, burned cars, businesses and schools, and fought with police, sometimes in neighbourhoods with substantial Jewish populations.

"Sarkozy promised a tough response," Guedj said sternly, "but I believe he was also fair."

Guedj explained that suburban youths face high unemployment, even when they have high-level diplomas, because their parents have no networks to help them and employers sometimes don't want to hire Arabs or blacks.

"You know very well that in France, it's against the law to count people or to group people according to their ethnic origins," she said. "But Sarkozy is the only candidate who has come out and said he is in favour of some kind of affirmative action program, what we call positive discrimination in French."

An Algerian native, Guedj came to France in 1961 with her parents during a mass exodus of Jews when the former French colony became independent.

Opinions

And then it hit me

Can it possibly be 2007?

I can't believe I just typed 2007. Is it possible? Perhaps we misplaced a few years? Is it really 2007?

How come I didn't know? I mean really, you'd think we would all be ready for the new calendar year when it gets here. After all, it takes a full year – 12 months – to arrive. So how come I feel so unprepared? I'm not even comfortable with 2006 yet!

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

In fact, I think I totally missed the whole new millennium. Weren't we all supposed to have some gigantic traumatic event that would sear itself into our consciousness? Well, it's definitely not in mine. A new millennium dawned seven years ago and I'm still the same. How could that be?

Somehow, the years just passed me by.

No, I'm not claiming that I haven't aged. That I feel. Rather, it's the passage of time that should feel momentous and instead appears commonplace. We get so caught up in daily activities that we don't catch the whole passing. Time seems to creep up on us without due notice.

There ought to be a law.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel placed great emphasis on Judaism's sense of time. He noted that instead of great cathedrals, we have created a wondrous architecture of time. Shabbat is a monument of sacred duration rather than sacred space. I have often felt this great sense of the holiness and sanctity of time that is embedded in our celebrations.

Yet our holy days generate a cyclical sense of seasons and sanctity rather than a linear development. Thus, the sense of the passage of time and of our passing through this dimension of life is less regnant.

I am prepared to age and am thankful for the opportunity. I am well aware of the historical unfolding of our world and even the advancement of my own particular family. The generations are moving on, and I have seven grandchildren to prove it. My memory is not the problem here.

Perhaps it's our human propensity to see the trees and not the forest, to feel the incremental growth but not the cosmic pattern. We greet every day as new and full of potential, but when all the days orchestrate a new year, then the global pattern seems to leap out at us as though we are unprepared.

I suppose it's to avoid this very sense of anomie – of being set adrift, of being unprepared – that causes us to have new year celebrations. Rituals prepare us for the next stage – they mark time and help us to absorb new realities into our consciousness.

Maybe by writing this column I have absorbed, but I still need time to digest.

Welcome 2007!

The book and the sword

Forget Saks Fifth Avenue – used bookstores are where it's at. The most unexpected Judaic treasures can be found there. In Port Townsend, Wash., I found an entire Judaica library. In Flagstaff, Ariz., I found a quality used bookstore in a glitzy mall. What will they think of next, those crazy Yanks?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

My latest treasure is The Book and the Sword, an autobiography by the eminent talmudist Rabbi David Weiss Halivni. I actually met him once, although he doesn't know it, at the Shabbat minyan in the home of Prof. Louis Finkelstein. Halivni's passionate and profound understanding of Talmud and his mentoring of female students at the Jewish Theological Seminary gave him a special place in my heart. Even when he broke with the seminary over the ordination of women, he never wavered in his drive to educate a generation of female Talmud scholars.

His autobiography is subtitled "A Life of Learning in the Shadow of Destruction." Rabbi Halivni grew up in Sighet, Hungary. His childhood was surrounded with poverty, sickness, death, and family strife, and what saved him from despair was the love of his chassidic grandfather and the joy he found in the study of Talmud. Young David was an ilui, a child prodigy. His entire family perished in the Holocaust and he endured at least three camps before liberation. Mentored in the United States by Rabbi Finkelstein and Rabbi Saul Lieberman, he rose in the academic world and at the time of the writing of this concise and restrained autobiography, he was professor of religion at Columbia University.

The sword was the dagger that the Nazis used to carve out the heart of European Jewry; the book, the sea of Talmud. The image of a sword can have a more benign meaning. On the one hand, it can deliver a swift, clear, clean cut as it strikes. The lines are clear, and one can imagine its stroke as the deciding cut of a talmudic argument: "the sages say" – and that ends it. Yet, as Rabbi Halivni explains, his deep understanding of the text and his approach to talmudic idiom allows us to see the written text in a more malleable light, until its essence is made clear by further textual exploration.

On the other hand, the parry and thrust of swordplay mimics the parry and thrust of Jewish learning, as students compete to understand the text. "Swimming in the sea of Talmud" brings another image. The sea is filled with currents, subject to tides, animated by innumerable life forms that interact, prey on each other, provide sustenance for man and creature, and follow their own hidden cycles.

It's up to the scientist to make sense of the sea and its creatures. So, too, with the arguments embedded in our sacred texts. The scholar reaches into the sea of Talmud and makes sense of its creatures.

And so with the professor. After the war, he insisted on combining Jewish with secular studies and developed his approach to the text, seeking to illuminate its ambiguities by searching for the original texts that led to the version that we hold in our hands today. It's not a historical approach, he writes, but one that looks to other texts until the true version is revealed.

But don't think that this is a cool, rational memoir. It is filled with emotion, whether in discussing the issues that divided him from his JTS colleagues or in remembering his lost family and community.

"The purpose of this memoir," he writes, "is to define myself spiritually in the light of the Holocaust (what an odd combination, 'light' and 'Holocaust'). My spiritual self is learning, learning Torah, the Bible and the Talmud, as a highly stimulating pursuit permeated with divinity… The only cruelty that asserts itself again and again in these recollections is the gassing… Just think of a child whom you love, your own, a relative's a friend's, and imagine pushing him or her into the gas chamber. What kind of a person could do that?"

We can only stand in awe of the way this exceptional man rebuilt his life, giving us a luminous way of studying our most cherished texts, now reclaimed from the sword that ruled in the Kingdom of the Night.

CJC helped shape the Charter

On April 17 of this year, Canada will mark the 25th anniversary of the coming into force of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In the quarter century since the Charter was incorporated as an integral part of the Canadian Constitution, it has transformed certain aspects of Canadian society.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

While the Charter has not unduly affected the traditional nature of Canadian life in some areas, it has caused Canadians to accept some new realities. These include the entrenchment into our Constitution of the values of egalitarianism, multiculturalism, religious freedom and free expression.

Under the Charter, issues have arisen that bear directly on public policy. These issues have included abortion, election-financing limits, religious instruction, prayers and the wearing of the Sikh ceremonial sword or kirpan in public schools, prisoners' right to vote in federal elections, same-sex marriage and other controversial issues faced by public decision makers.

How did we get here? What was the role of the Jewish community in serving as a steward on the road to the present?

The Canadian Jewish Congress has traditionally played a vibrant and active role in promoting a social-action agenda that not only benefited the Jewish community but would also enhance the Canadian experience. From 1980 to 1982, when the Charter was introduced as part of a constitutional patriation package by then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau, Congress swiftly moved into high gear.

In that formative period, Congress established a special committee to study the proposed Charter. That committee was chaired by the late Judge Maxwell Cohen, a distinguished former dean of law at McGill University and an internationally recognized scholar in matters of international law and human rights. Drawn from the Jewish community across Canada, members of the committee included some of the more prominent figures of the day in Canadian constitutional law, human rights and public service.

From those early days of Charter development, the Cohen committee conducted a detailed study of the proposed Charter and made recommendations for change. On behalf of the committee, Judge Cohen made an important and influential presentation to the Special House/Senate joint committee on the Constitution.

The Charter was subsequently amended to include some of the changes suggested by a number of groups. But the most significant changes came as a result of the recommendations specifically made by the CJC.

One of these recommendations addressed the freedom of expression clause in the Charter. The Congress committee and its chair, Cohen, were concerned that this section of the Charter might have a negative impact on the existing Criminal Code provisions in relation to the propagation of hate. In a sense, Cohen was the father of those laws as he and others (including a then-young law professor, Pierre Trudeau) had been appointed to study the issue in the mid-1960s.

Several years later, when Canada had to deal with the issue of Quebec's future in Canada, including its constitutional recognition as a distinct entity within Canada, Congress established another committee on the constitution, somewhat modelled after the Cohen committee, chaired by prominent Montreal lawyer Max Bernard. That committee led, in part, to the establishment of a coalition of Quebec's Jewish, Hellenic and Italian communities.

For more than 25 years, Canada's organized Jewish community has played a major role in this country's constitutional development. First there was the Cohen committee, then the Bernard committee, and throughout the quarter century since the promulgation of the Charter, there were, on occasion, formal interventions in cases before the courts. This included a dramatic and successful intervention in the Vriend case on the issue of sexual orientation, in which the Supreme Court unanimously decided that the failure to include sexual orientation as an illegal ground of discrimination in the Alberta Individual Rights Protection Act constituted a violation of section 15(1) of the Charter.

What has the Charter contributed in moulding Canadian society and where will it take us in the next 25 years? These issues will be discussed in several anniversary conferences this spring, including a major conference sponsored by McGill University and another by the Association for Canadian Studies.

When marking the occasion of the Charter's 25th anniversary, one should not overlook the role of Canada's Jewish community in contributing to the process of constitutional evolution, including a significant role in shaping the Charter's still-youthful history.

Cold blast of reality buries latest truce with Palestinians

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What passes for a ceasefire in Israel's seemingly perpetual conflict with the Palestinians is inevitably an extremely fragile construct. A truce was announced last November after five months of sporadic fighting, during which the Israeli army repeatedly struck Palestinian positions in the Gaza Strip following the capture of the soldier Gilad Shalit on June 25 in a cross-border raid. But late last month, after yet another violation of the truce by the Palestinians, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ordered the army to respond to Palestinian Qassam rocket firings, and once again the viability of the ceasefire was thrown into doubt.

The truce, which was limited to Gaza despite efforts to extend it to the West Bank, was cobbled together after Israel and the Palestinians agreed to abide by two major conditions. Palestinian militants in Gaza – which Israel evacuated in a unilateral withdrawal in the summer of 2005 – would refrain from firing Qassam rockets into Israeli territory, while Israel would cease all retaliatory operations there.

The durability of the ceasefire, the third in three years, rested on two pillars.

Hamas, which surprisingly won last winter's election, would form a unity government with the rival Fatah faction so that peace talks with Israel could be renewed and international aid to the Palestinians could be resumed. In addition, Israel would release a portion of the 9,000 Palestinians in its captivity and ease conditions in the West Bank. Israel would also release millions of dollars worth of tax and customs revenues to the Palestinian Authority.

It seemed like a workable plan until the cold blast of reality set in.

The Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, and the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, failed to establish a government of national unity despite concerted talks. In utter frustration, Abbas threatened to call new parliamentary elections and to disband the main Hamas militia. Amid these sombre developments, the prospect of civil war loomed once more as internecine fighting broke out between their respective militias and claimed the lives of about 30 Palestinian fighters and civilians.

Worst of all, from Israel's point of view, Abbas did not rein in the rain of Qassams. By last week, more than 80 Qassams had landed in Israel since the ceasefire began Nov. 26, many crashing into the southern town of Sderot, injuring residents and damaging property. Islamic Jihad, an Iranian-backed group that refused to recognize the truce, took responsibility for the launchings. Citing continued Israeli raids in the West Bank, Islamic Jihad admitted that it deliberately broke the ceasefire to provoke Israel.

In spite of these provocations, Israel and Fatah tried to shore up the shaky truce. On Dec. 23, Olmert – who had promised to meet Abbas "anywhere, anytime without preconditions" – finally made good on his rhetoric and met the Palestinian leader in Jerusalem. The long-delayed meeting was sweeping in scope. The pair reiterated their commitment to a meaningful peace process that would lead to a two-state solution. Olmert, in a speech at the tomb of David Ben-Gurion the month before, had declared that he was prepared to grant the Palestinians statehood, release desperately needed funds and free Palestinian prisoners. For his part, Abbas had urged Israel to resume negotiations toward a final peace agreement that recognized Palestinian "national rights."

In a gesture aimed at strengthening Abbas in his current confrontation with Hamas, Israel agreed to soon release $100 million of the Palestinians' $500 million in tax and customs revenues, provided a way could be found to ensure that the funds did not reach Hamas.

As well, Israel consented to remove 25 checkpoints in the West Bank that have severely restricted the movement of Palestinians, and to take steps to improve the flow of exports and imports in and out of Gaza.

Sadly, good intentions have not borne much fruit.

Israel has removed a number of checkpoints, but the funds that Olmert pledged to channel to the Palestinians have yet to materialize.

Meanwhile, the Qassams keep on falling with impunity, the Palestinian Authority being unable or unwilling to staunch the barrage.

No Palestinian prisoners have been released either, probably due to the fact that Shalit remains imprisoned despite a recent statement by Hamas' armed wing that "a breakthrough" was imminent.

Egypt has worked hard to gain Shalit's freedom, but its diplomacy has been dashed by the imperatives of Israeli and Palestinian domestic politics.

Olmert, whose popularity ratings have plummeted since last summer's inconclusive war with Hezbollah in Lebanon, insists that Palestinian prisoners cannot be released unless Shalit is first freed.

Influential Hamas leaders in exile, notably Khaled Mashal, the target of an Israeli assassination attempt in 1997, will not sanction a prisoner exchange until Israel releases hundreds of Palestinians beforehand.

So the stalemate festers.

The problem is compounded by Israel's settlement policy.

Only three days after Olmert's tete-a-tete with Abbas, Israel disclosed plans to build a new settlement in the West Bank for the first time in a decade.

Known as Maskiot, the outpost will be in the Jordan Valley. Israel claimed that Maskiot is really an old settlement that will be rehabilitated.

But the United States deplored the announcement, saying that Maskiot would violate Israel's obligations under the 2003 "road map" peace plan and predetermine the outcome of final status talks.

The Palestinians vigorously condemned the announcement, saying that the construction of new settlements runs counter to Olmert's understandings with Abbas not to engage in unilateral moves.

As Israel was constantly bombarded by Qassams, Olmert said he wanted to exercise restraint so as to preserve the ceasefire. But Israel's defence minister, the normally dovish Amir Peretz, argued that restraint had not worked and that Israel had a duty to protect the security of its citizens.

The hawkish opposition leader, Benjamin Netanyahu, was even blunter, calling on Olmert to reoccupy key areas of the Philadelphi Route – the small land mass that separates Israel from Gaza – as well as to cancel all gestures to the Palestinians and topple the Hamas government.

Olmert stuck to his policy of restraint until late December, when two Israeli teenage boys from Sderot were badly injured by Qassam rockets. At this point, he ordered the armed forces to strike before, during and after the launching of a Qassam from Gaza. But in a concession to Abbas, he barred the army from firing artillery shells into Gaza as a deterrent to terrorists. The army, however, will be permitted to carry our preventive attacks in the West Bank without limitations, as indicated by an Israeli daylight raid into Ramallah on Jan. 4 to apprehend an Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade ringleader.

It seems clear that last November's truce is destined to share the same fate as the tahdiye, the ceasefire that lasted from January to September 2005, and the hudna, the short-lived ceasefire that imploded in the summer of 2003 after violations by both sides.

So peace remains a mirage in the desert, an elusive and perhaps impossible quest.

'A baseline acceptance as a Jew would be nice'

"They've also had to deal with the reaction of a community which feels that I am something they should be ashamed of," she said.

Even if they'd like to be supportive, accepting Nicole is a difficult adjustment for everybody who was touched by Mordechai.

"A gender change is not minimal," said Gav Martell, a friend of Nicole's since high school.

"It's different in terms of relating. You go for coffee instead of going for beers after playing hockey – and I don't go out for coffee or beer with women by myself."

He also had to consider what to tell his three young children, who know Nicole.

"Do I need to expose my 5½-year-old daughter to this? Why do I have to give her the option that she might say she wants to be a boy now?" Martell asked. "It's not normal. In a normal, non-religious society, there would be issues, too."

Travis Kearns, a friend of Nicole's from law school who is not Jewish but plays on a mostly Orthodox hockey team, called Nicole's transition "well outside the ordinary."

"I'm far more liberal than anyone in the Orthodox community, but I understand why it was such a shock to them," Kearns said, adding that "these types of things resonate more powerfully" in the Orthodox community.

Kearns feels like he mourned his lost friendship with Mordechai.

"I loved him dearly and I miss him," he said. "But on a different level, Nord is still Nord. The core things are there, just in a different package."

"I'm not a progressive by any means," said Gershon Miskin, a childhood friend of Nicole's. "I'm a pretty religious guy. But he's not making excuses for himself. It was a question of life and death. From what I understand, he would have thrown himself in front of a train. I truly believe that."

In terms of Nicole's future in the Toronto community, Miskin said "it will be easier for people to acclimate if he has the opportunity to 'see and be seen,' if he would be invited out to gatherings. It would be strange and weird, but people would get used to it."

He also expressed regret that rabbis and community leaders have failed to act in what he called a "statesmanlike way," and that any overtures to them that Nicole has made have been met with silence.

"I know they're human and never had to deal with anything like this before," Miskin said. "But nobody wants to touch this one."

It remains to be seen how the community will adapt to Nicole's transition and to what extent she'll be able to reintegrate. Though she hasn't yet gone to synagogue in a place where people might know her, the issue ultimately may not be which side of the mechitzah Nicole sits on.

"I don't care as much about being 'accepted' as a woman, and I have limited influence over whether or not I am," Nicole said. "But a baseline acceptance as a human being and a Jew would be nice.

"I'm not trying to make a political statement and I don't want to be in anybody's face. But no person should be made to disappear."

Second bone marrow drive scheduled

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A second bone marrow donor drive is being held for Zvi Golish, a father of seven in his early 50s who has acute myeloid leukemia and needs a transplant to survive.

Held under the auspices of the Gift of Life, North America's only Jewish donor registry, based in Boca Raton, Fla., the drive is being held Jan. 21 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Bais Yaakov Elementary School, 15 Saranac Blvd.

Tammy Balitsky, a friend of Golish since high school, and organizer of the drive, said the test involves a simple mouth swab used to collect DNA from the potential donor.

Golish, who is receiving treatment at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Md., is in a dire situation, she said.

Since tissue type is inherited, the best chance of finding a genetically matched donor lies with people of eastern European Jewish ethnic ancestry, Balitsky said.

Representatives from Gift of Life will be present at the drive to register potential donors and answer questions.

Balitsky is in the process of raising money to fund the testing kits, which cost $100 (US) each.

"I'm not a fundraiser, but no one I have approached has refused. People have been unbelievably generous with their money and their time," she said.

"I have never seen such kindness from people in the entire community. At the first drive [held Nov. 26 at the Leah Posluns Theatre], there was an amazing outpouring of love. The family was [tremendously] moved."

Eligible donors must be between the ages of 18 and 60 and in overall good health. They will be entered in the Gift of Life bone marrow registry for the benefit of patients worldwide in need of life-saving matches.

For information, call Balitsky at 416-667-7599.

Student is first Canadian on U.S. program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Adira Winegust is the first Canadian to become a Senator Joseph Lieberman Scholar, but she has likely seen more of the United States than her American counterparts have.

Travelling on extended car trips with her parents, Fred and Rina, and her four siblings on summer vacations, the 17-year-old Grade 12 student has visited every state except Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Louisiana, Alaska and Hawaii.

Next month, and in March, Winegust, who attends the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus, will head to Washington, D.C., as part of a project of the Orthodox Union's Institute for Public Affairs and National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY).

Winegust is one of only five students selected for the program, which is for final-year high school students "dedicated to transforming the world into a better place," according to a news release.

She has been involved with NCSY since Grade 8, and says she has been influenced by the amount of kiruv (outreach) the Orthodox organization does. That, and her parents' open-door policy, have played a role in her inviting more friends for Shabbat dinner.

"Definitely going to a pluralistic school has opened my worldview," she said, referring to the diverse Jewish backgrounds and observance levels of her fellow students. "I guess it really does foster respect for everyone."

Adina Winegust

The Washington component of the Lieberman program – named for the Connecticut senator who was the Democratic candidate for vice-president in the 2000 American election – will include the monitoring of issues in Congress and attendance at the Jewish Council for Public Affairs policy plenum.

At home, the Lieberman scholars – all of whom are Orthodox and most of whom attended the General Assembly for United Jewish Communities in Los Angeles in November, – will initiate political activities in their own communities.

Winegust, who was involved in a Save Darfur rally at her school last year and who lists the environment as one of her top concerns, is planning to sell purple ribbons for Eating Disorders Awareness Month in April.

A newspaper reader from the age of seven, Winegust regularly reads two dailies as well as The CJN, Newsweek magazine and CNN online, and she hopes to bring a Canadian perspective to the Lieberman program. "I want to raise awareness that there are other countries besides the States that [American] policies affect."

On her return, she wants to share a more informed opinion on the senatorial system after observing how it operates in the United States.

Among the politicians she admires are the late Golda Meir, a pioneer in her role as the first female prime minister of Israel, and the late Lester B. Pearson, Canada's 14th prime minister, because "he not only did stuff for Canada but for the world; he also started the United Nations peacekeeping forces."

A self-described "political animal," Winegust follows in the footsteps of her father, a former NCSYer and political activist as part of the now-defunct Jewish student organization Network.

But despite – or perhaps because of – her busy schedule, Winegust said she believes in "a healthy balance." She doesn't pull all-nighters to get her schoolwork done, she said, but she admitted to having "homework binge nights."

At school, she is head peer tutor, head of religious affairs and head of research for the Yom Hashoah assembly committee. She also wrote a play that will be staged at this year's Paprika Theatre Festival in March, and last year she appeared in a friend's play at the same event.

After high school, Winegust plans to study for a year at a women's seminary in Israel, a country she has already visited on a family trip and as a participant on March of the Living, before returning to Canada and preparing for a career in medicine.

Toronto woman wins Israeli book fair fellowship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Torontonian Marilyn Biderman has won a prestigious Israeli fellowship.

A publishing house employee, she is the sole Canadian to receive a Jerusalem International Book Fair fellowship this year.

Biderman, the director of rights and contracts at McClelland & Stewart, will head to Israel on Feb. 12 and return about two weeks later.

The Jerusalem International Book Fair, first held in 1963, is a biennial event that draws on more than 1,200 publishers from some 40 countries and brings to attention approximately 100,000 new books.

In 1985, the fair established an editorial fellowship program for promising young editors, and recently, it launched a parallel program for literary agents.

Biderman, 51, qualified for the newest fellowship in her capacity as McClelland & Stewart's director of rights and contracts.

A trained lawyer and member of the First Narayever Congregation, she has visited Israel before, but this will be her first appearance at the fair.

"This trip will bring my Jewish and publishing worlds together," she said in an interview last week.

She is looking forward to it.

"The fellowship brings to Israel editors and agents working in book publishing from all over the world," she said. "With the setting of Israel's most important publishing trade fair, it provides an opportunity to experience Israel's rich contemporary publishing culture, and promotes an understanding of Israel to those who otherwise may have never been exposed to it."

McClelland & Stewart already has close relationships with Israeli publishers, and many of its books have been translated into Hebrew.

"But there is always something special that happens when you visit people where they work and live," Biderman said. "I know I'll gain a deeper understanding of the Israeli publishing industry, forge new business relationships and wave the flag for Canadian culture."

Biderman initially visited Israel with her parents when she was a teenager.

"My second trip was on a New Israel Fund mission eight years ago," she noted. "And it was extraordinary."

She joined McClelland & Stewart in 1997.

"I have a two-pronged position. I'm responsible for the contracts between the company and authors, and where we hold rights, I'm responsible for selling them."

Among the writers she has dealt with are Leonard Cohen, Anne Michaels and newcomer Bernice Eisenstein, whose book, I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors, is soon scheduled to be translated into four editions.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

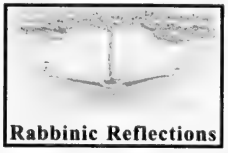
Jewish Life

We learn from our elders

By RABBI CHAIM YOSEF ACKERMAN

"Inquire of your elders, and they will inform you…" –Deuteronomy 32:7

We are all familiar with the greatness attributed to Moses and Aaron, and we read about their rise to prominence in the Torah portions we are currently reading. The 15th- to 16th-century exegete Rabbi Ovadiah Sforno lends insight into a significant contributing factor in their rise to eminence. He explains in his commentary to Shmot (Exodus), Chapter 6, Verse 14, that because Levi, their grandfather, outlived the rest of the tribes, he invested his efforts into raising his descendants in a way that produced Moses, Aaron and Miriam.



Upon further inspection, he says that Levi had indeed outlived his siblings, but only by 10 years, yet the privilege that he had in being able to study with his grandchildren proved invaluable in developing their path to greatness.

The Sforno explanation provides us with a precious insight into the value of tutelage from the older generation. At the root of this potent force is the concept that defines our Yiddishkeit, and that is our mesorah (history and transmission of our traditions), the component that gives our people the immortality of thought and belief in and anchor to HaShem, crucial to our success as the chosen nation.

The story is told of an illustrious Torah scholar who was travelling by train with a young assistant who tended devotedly to the scholar's every need. An atheist occupying the adjacent seat took up conversation with the rabbi and questioned the young man's tenacious attentiveness to his elder's requirements.

The response came back that since we trace our heritage back to the Revelation at Mt. Sinai, our people believe that the elders of every generation are our link back to that legacy, and therefore, they are treated with the utmost reverence. This, the rejoinder concluded, is in contrast with evolutionists who believe that our ancestry traces itself back to the apes, thereby attributing to the older generation a closer tie to those prehistoric animals than the more technologically advanced younger age group.

Another support for the concept in question is found in the Talmud (Sanhedrin, 11a), where Rabbi Chiya shames himself in order to spare another person from embarrassment. He does this because he is following the example set by his teacher Rabbi Meir, who had learned to do so from his teacher Shmuel HaKoton, etc., tracing the idea all the way back to Joshua who learned it from God Himself. This seems to indicate, as the Maharsha (Rabbi Shemuel Eliezer Eidel) elucidates, that Rabbi Chiya needed to have the transmission of this concept traced back through the mesorah in order to properly carry it out.

We live in a generation where the more experienced among us are often impatiently listened to and then generally not heeded. The true worth and resources of our elders remain largely untapped, as youths seek to cultivate their own advances and leave behind the "antiquated" ways of the past.

The message of Sforno, however, is central to our Jewish belief system, underscoring that success in the future can be achieved only with the proper regard for the lessons already learned by our predecessors. We must devote some of our time and attention to the seasoned members of the Jewish people, inside our families and out, to secure our triumph in the times that lie ahead.

Chained in fear

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

My colleague Norma Joseph recently wrote a beautiful CJN column about the cancelled Jerusalem conference that would have finally dealt with the problem of agunot, "chained women" who are waiting for Jewish divorces from their husbands.

Apparently there is no problem, Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Amar said, and so no need for a conference.

But there is most definitely a problem: a rabbinic leadership that is unwilling to deal with the problem. To understand it, all Rabbi Amar has to do is walk the halls of the rabbinic courts, where women wait for compassion that doesn't come, so they can remarry and have children and go on with their lives.

Maybe he should see the incredible documentary Mekudeshet (titled Sentenced to Marriage in English), which records some of those moments on film. Perhaps he would be shocked into action when he sees the scene of a haredi woman, desperate after 12 years of being an agunah, screaming in the hall of the rabbinic court, "There is no God! There is no mercy!" When those heart-rending screams reverberate, you viscerally feel the toll that this "non-problem" has taken on religious women.

Norma asks simply: Why? What were these rabbis and leaders so afraid of? There seems to be no rational answer.

But there is an answer and I will speak it. The rabbis who cancelled the conference are afraid of the "f word" – feminism.

Feminism has enabled women to see themselves as persons in their own right. The feminist influence has been felt in every stream of Judaism. And though some of the women who wait for their get would not call themselves feminists, nor see themselves as feminists, if they analyze the issue, they will see something profound: that the promise of full personhood, and the end of marginality that feminism posits, has empowered them, too.

And that is precisely what is so threatening about feminism, and why the backlash against feminism in the traditional world is so strong. Ensuring that women's voices are heard, that women's full rights as persons are enacted, and that women are no longer a halachic "other" has a domino effect. It leads women to expect that they will be actors in their own lives, not just acted upon, and that they will not have their fate determined for them against their will by another person.

Let's face it: if the rabbis "give in" to feminism, they will be seen as cuckolded and weak. They will be seen as giving credence to a modern idea that is a moving current and getting stronger all the time. They will be seen as "giving in" on all women's issues if they "give in" on this one. And they seem willing to ruin the future of many young Jewish women for this "principle."

I imagine Rebbe Meir with his wife Bruriah finding a solution. I imagine the responsive rabbis of the Talmud finding a way. I imagine the great rabbis of the medieval codes gathering a conclave and ordering a takanah to unchain these women. Only in our generation are the needs of women so unheeded because of the "f word."

I cry for those women in chains whose leaders won't unchain them. But I cry more for leaders who have chained themselves to their fear.

Parting pay

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

It used to be that when one was let go for unacceptable performance, the rewards were few and far between. However, it seems that nowadays, the way for a senior executive to really make some money is to get fired.

The latest example is the ouster of Home Depot's CEO, Robert Nardelli. Despite the fact that the company's stock has fallen more than eight per cent in the six years he served as CEO, he received a severance package worth approximately $210 million (yes – that is million). Unfortunately – or, should I say, fortunately – this is far from the norm, and many workers are happy to accept a few months' salary when being let go.

Interestingly, Jewish labour law does not, in theory at least, mandate the payment of severance. This is in keeping with the traditional Jewish notion – one that was prevalent until modern times – that workers were paid only for actual time worked. No sick pay, no vacation pay and no statutory holidays.

It was only in the case of a slave that the Torah required severance. Having worked for six years with no economic capital to show for it, the slave must be given some help toward his economic future. Unlike other employees, he could not quit his job, and thus his economic opportunities were essentially non-existent. While some have argued that if a slave, who was most commonly sold into slavery in order to pay for amounts he had stolen, is to be given severance, then all the more so should other employees. The majority view, however, is that a legal obligation for severance does not exist for other workers.

Nonetheless, Jewish authorities have strongly stated that giving severance is the ethical expectation. This is not meant as help for the ex-employee, but as a moral message to the employer. Having profited from the work of others, the employer should show gratitude to God by sharing some of his wealth with those who most directly helped to accumulate it. Just as we want God to bestow kindness on us, we must also do so to others. One of the greatest challenges facing us in the workplace is realizing that despite our hard work and business acumen, our wealth is due to the benevolence of God. Many people who work just as hard as us and are just as smart are often much less "successful." What we tend to call luck is in reality the hand of God. Thus, Judaism tries to inculcate the value of giving to others beyond our legal obligations – severance pay just being one of many examples.

However, a golden parachute worth hundreds (or even tens) of millions of dollars is nothing less than obscene, even if it's perfectly legal. Such packages highlight a common ethical challenge of the impersonal corporate world. Corporations, having their own legal identity and status, can foster attitudes that would never exist if one was dealing with somebody's personal money. Can one ever imagine a private corporation offering such a package? Somehow the money of shareholders is treated in a much more frivolous manner.

Furthermore, when senior management is hired by a board, there is a risk that executives will make decisions that benefit management and not the ultimate owners of the company, the shareholders themselves. It's in the board's interest to offer outlandish compensation packages, as such riches often trickle down to the compensation of board members, some of whom will no doubt attain senior executive positions themselves.

Unfortunately, the almighty dollar is the measure of corporate success. While Judaism embraces financial success, moral astuteness and ethical sensitivity are goals that, if attained, bring much greater riches.

Kugel – tradition, recipes and lore

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began to look at kugel, the pudding (often noodle or potato) that's enjoyed on Shabbat. There are practically endless variations and scores of sites that boast the best recipes anywhere. [http://tinyurl.com/voa2l]

Well, it's one thing to read a kugel recipe, it's another to be in your grandmother's kitchen and watch her go through the steps. But if your own grandmother isn't a kugel maven, you can borrow Avrom Honig's grandma. In Feed Me Bubbe, Honig has created a series of videos in which his charismatic bubbie demonstrates how to prepare traditional Jewish foods including chicken soup, mandle bread, baked fish, sponge cake, and of course, kugel. Absolutely delightful! [http://tinyurl.com/yn3syc]

If you find yourself travelling in South African circles, be careful whom you call a "kugel." According to Wikipedia, "the word 'kugel' was used by the older generation as a scornful term for a young Jewish woman who forsook traditional Jewish values in favour of those of secular high society, becoming overly materialistic and excessively groomed, the kugel being a plain pudding garnished as a delicacy. The women thus described made light of the term and it has since become an amusing rather than derogatory slang term in South African English, referring to a materialistic young woman." [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kugel]

Even the biggest kugel fan might think twice about sitting down to sample more than 60 different kinds of kugel. But that's just what Faye Levy did at a "Kugl Kukh-Off" in Los Angeles. "Some of the noodle kugels were the sweet, creamy type, some with apples, cherries or dried fruit. One was studded with chocolate chips." But the winner "was a model of purity and simplicity. This was the entry that we considered 'most like bubbie used to make' – if grandma was a superb cook." [http://tinyurl.com/y8chg2] Don't miss the link to Lisa Share-Sapolsky's prize-winning noodle kugel (sweetened with honey rather than sugar). And for good measure, Faye Levy also includes her own mother's Kugel with Mushrooms.

Can a kugel bring a marriage to the brink – and then restore marital bliss? The Chabad.org site tells the tale of an 18th-century Chassid with a unique complaint. He loved his wife's kugel and couldn't wait for Shabbat to arrive to taste it. But what does his wife do? "She torments me! After I recite the Kiddush, do I get the kugel? No-o-o-o. First she serves the gefilte fish. Then the soup. Then the chicken. And the potatoes. Then a couple of other dishes, and then I'm full. I can't possibly take one more bite. Then she brings in the kugel! Now shouldn't I divorce her?" Read what advice the wise Kosnitzer Maggid gave the couple in the Shalom Bayit Kugel. [http://tinyurl.com/ymbpzn]

Writing in the New York Times, Joan Nathan says that a kugel could even possess mystical qualities. She quotes Allan Nadler, a professor of religious studies at New Jersey's Drew University. Nadler has studied references to kugel in chassidic texts and has eaten it at rebbes' tishes, or tables, where followers of a chassidic rabbi gather to eat, sing and study the Torah." According to Nadler, "the spiritual high point of the meal is the offering of the kugel." Nathan continues, "At that moment, the rabbi has the power to bestow health and food, and even to help couples conceive." [http://tinyurl.com/tqfpp]

The milknhoney.co.il website has more kabbalistic ruminations from a rabbi who has clearly done a lot of thinking about kugels. The page's author was speaking to Rabbi Mordechai Shienberger of Jerusalem's Old City who told him two drashot (religious insights) about Jerusalem Kugel. "The Jerusalem Kugel is round (before it gets cut up). A circle has no end. The greatness of the holiness of Shabbat also contains an infinite, non-ending aspect. Additionally, the rabbi states that the gematriah [Jewish numerology] of the word kugel and Shabbat are equal." That second insight puzzled the author because "when one does a little bit of math, one finds that that Shabbat equals a much higher number than kugel. To this the rabbi responds that you must eat more kugel for them to become even." [http://tinyurl.com/v2fwk]

Bathurst Jewish Community Centre director takes skills to Kishinev

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

On September 13, 2005, a new Jewish Community Centre, built with Toronto's help, opened its doors in Kishinev, the capital of Moldova, Europe's poorest country.

The community centre - made possible by a donation to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto - provides Kishinev's 18,000 Jews with a wide range of social, recreational and religious services. Built on the site of an old synagogue, the JCC immediately helped to reignite Jewish life in a country where communism once quashed all Jewish expression.

Still, despite the success of the year-old JCC, its inexperienced staff can use all the help they can get, and once again, Toronto has answered the call.

Sherry Kulman, executive director of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), recently spent a week in Kishinev as part of a mentorship program bringing together JCC directors from North America and their counterparts in the Former Soviet Union.

Impressed by the extent of programming and services developed by the Kishinev JCC in its first year, Kulman was nonetheless struck by the absence of a strategic plan and made its development a top priority. She provided staff with the necessary tools to move forward, including recommendations for committees and community engagement.

"It's been a month and it's been reported that they've started the work and the committees, so that's quite rewarding," says Kulman who, with the help of a translator, continues to advise the Kishinev JCC.

Spending the majority of her time at the Kishinev JCC with its executive director, Ilya Shatz – but also meeting with the board, agency heads, and various staff members – Kulman shared her knowledge of "staffing, fundraising, marketing, strategic planning, developing lay leadership – all those things that I do in the course of my job as the executive director of the BJCC," she explains.

A collective deficiency in experience meant that she had to teach what she calls "the fundamentals of running an organization," from instructing board members on how board meetings should function to the suggestion that the JCC and its partner agencies share supplies and clerical staff. A particular challenge was brainstorming about effective but inexpensive programs and ways to build up the centre's donor base, in a culture in which there is almost no history of paying for Jewish communal services.

The one-year-old Kishinev JCC (above) made possible by a donation to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. (INSET PHOTO) Sherry Kulman, executive director of Toronto's Bathurst Jewish Community Centre recently shared her expertise in Kishinev.

The Kishinev JCC also suffers from a knowledge gap regarding Jewish culture and ritual, a byproduct of life under the former communist regime. Kulman cites the confusion that arose about the order in which to light Chanukah and Shabbat candles while she was there. "It took a few minutes to figure out, because there was no one there who knew," says Kulman.

While there may be gaps in knowledge, the community's sincerity and warmth are unquestionable.

When Kulman requested a minyan so that she could recite kaddish for her recently deceased father, community members responded quickly. "We went to a nearby theatre one evening where they handed out a piece of paper with the kaddish phonetically translated into Russian and everyone recited it," says Kulman. "And what was so stark for me was the fact that they really don't have the knowledge, but it was also very heartwarming because they did everything they could to put it together for me."

A Chanukah present for Sderot's children

Hundreds of Sderot young people narrowly missed a barrage of Kassam rockets on their city, thanks to the Jewish Agency for Israel's Chanukah program that brought over 5,000 children out of the line of fire.

On December 20, 2006 a record number of rockets was launched against western Negev residents. The streets of Sderot, meant to be filled with joyous Chanukah celebrations, were deserted. But many parents were able to breathe a sigh of relief as their children were safely enjoying museums and theatre performances in Tel Aviv.

"The Jewish Agency's extensive activities during Chanukah allowed our children to feel like children again," says Aryeh Houdari, director of the Sha'ar Hanegev Regional Council's Education Department. "It was wonderful to see them laughing and relaxing as they enjoyed shows, visited museums and toured the country. It was a much needed reprieve."

Some 2,700 young people attended theater performances in Tel Aviv. For a number of them, this was their first theatre experience. An additional 2,300 children and teenagers went to amusement parks, museums and educational tourist attractions in central Israel.

With the generous support of its partners around the world, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Agency also staged a colourful festival in the Eshkol Region that was open to the general public free of charge every day. Thousands of children and their parents from Sderot and the Gaza perimeter communities enjoyed circus performances, appearances by performing artists and good festival fun.

The Jewish Agency – UJA Federation's overseas agency - and its other partners are committed to supporting vulnerable populations in Israel. As such, families living in Sderot and surrounding areas have been invited for "tranquil weekends" away from the constant fear and terror they live under.

The Jewish Agency also assisted northern communities during Chanukah. Activities took place in Safed, Upper Galilee, Nahariya, Migdal Ha'emek, Hatzor Haglilit, Tiberias, Kiryat Shmona, Upper Nazareth and Maalot.

More than 5,000 Sderot youngsters were treated to a happy Chanukah by the Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA Federation's overseas partner.

The Campus Report

Just what is the Wolfond Centre?

Here's the answer.

By DANIEL ABRAMSON

There's a sense of intimidation that often comes with asking a question, even a seemingly innocent one. I see this hesitation on the faces of people as they come into the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, home of Hillel at the University of Toronto for the first time. Sometimes the asker of this question is a student, sometimes not. Sometimes Jewish, and sometimes Christian, or Muslim, or Buddhist. Some askers are Canadian, some Israeli, sometimes both and sometimes neither. Invariably, however, the questions are the same "What is this place? Who is it for? And, what exactly do you do here?" People in the community are genuinely curious about this place and our role in the greater community. You'd think by now after four years with Hillel, the answer would roll off my tongue without a moment's thought, but even now as I consider what it is that we actually do, I'm a bit awe-struck about the impact of our activities on the community.

Students enjoy a barbecue at The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

So what is the Wolfond Centre? Well, according to our mission statement we are "the address for Jewish student life in Toronto." We are a place where students come to find kosher food downtown. We are a comfortable place to study math, a comfortable place to study Hebrew. A place to watch TV, a place to come for Shabbat dinner and services, a place students find answers to geography questions, a place to crash after exams, a place to meet other Jews, and a place to find out about Jewish life on your own terms at your own pace. The Wolfond Centre is a hub for Jewish student life downtown.

Who is it for? It seems a simple enough question. Hillel is for Jewish students. And here again just when I think I have an adequate answer, I get this rush that reminds me just how many students we really touch and just how diverse they are. There are even non-Jewish students in Hillel who come to find out about who we are and what we believe. In truth, the fact that a person has come through our door and asks the question is a good indication that he or she is in the right place.

And lastly, what do we do? Again, looking to our mission statement one could answer that "through exciting and creative programming and events, Hillel promotes Jewish identity, student leadership, and religious and political diversity in a dynamic and inclusive environment for all Jewish students." So what does that mean? It means we connect the students I mentioned before with the things that they are passionate about, and give them a Jewish context in which they can explore their interests. It means that we send students to New Orleans to rebuild houses because they are passionate about tikkun olam, and that we have art exhibitions that showcase the work of students who are passionate about creatively expressing what it means to be a young Jewish person. It means that we bring students to Israel to ignite their passion for our people and our homeland. We meet students where they are as individuals. We celebrate the diversity of their character, and build a community where they feel safe to explore their Jewish identities.

Next time you happen to be in the neighbourhood, stop by and see for yourself what's happening at Hillel.

Daniel Abramson is program director for Hillel of Greater Toronto, at the University of Toronto. The Wolfond Centre is an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign.

Dershowitz conducts Advocacy 101 session with Toronto students

The House feels like home to renowned professor

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

It was an advocacy tutorial to remember for some 75 university students who listened intently to one of North America's masters of Jewish advocacy, Professor Alan Dershowitz.

Dershowitz recently delivered valuable impromptu advice for his college-age audience at The House in Toronto, which runs a variety of educational, leadership and social action programs for senior high school and university students.

The famed Harvard professor was speaking in advance of his keynote appearance at the December Rally for Truth, Light and Freedom, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto to expose Holocaust denial in Iran and elsewhere.

Among the suggestions and insights offered by Dershowitz were:

- No country in the history of warfare has ever killed fewer civilians than Israel.
- When the Palestinians kill civilians they cheer. When Israel kills civilians, it's a day of mourning.
- It's okay to criticize Israel. It gives your arguments in support of Israel more credibility.
- Members of Neturei Karta, the Jewish sect that recently attended Iran's Holocaust denial conference, should not be mistaken for Jews. "They are Jews for Hitler, Jews for Hamas and Jews for Hezbollah."
- Today's university generation has to translate books and articles supporting Israel into language that people their age will understand.

Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz addresses Toronto's Jewish university students at The House.

"Make no mistake about it," warned Dershowitz, "there is a coordinated and well-financed effort to try and convert Jews and non-Jews of your generation into the type of Israel-haters that will become the future leaders," he told the students. "All I can do is give you the tools to defend Israel, but you're the ones who must implement it."

"It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to meet with someone of Professor Dershowitz's caliber," said Leah Walters, a participant at the event. "I thought his attitude towards answering questions was very admirable and his answers were both thought-provoking and informative."

"At one point, Professor Dershowitz stopped the conversation to say how much he admired Toronto as the best Jewish community in North America – 'head and shoulders' above anywhere else in the States in which he has ever been to speak," said another participant, Shauna Waltman. "He spoke of our community with such reverence and respect. When the session was over, I left feeling empowered and inspired."

"The intimate event with Dershowitz was very helpful in allowing me to expand my thinking and knowledge about the Israeli conflicts which have – and continue – to occur on an ongoing basis," enthused Shauna Pernica. "I had never been to The House before and was very happy that I attended. It was educational, informative and eye-opening to hear such a powerful man talk about the ongoing battles we face as Jews and the ways in which we can counter anti-Semitism."

Despite his hectic travel schedule, Dershowitz himself seemed energized by the packed question and answer session that was arranged in just one hour by The House founder, Rabbi Rafi Lipner.

"What a wonderful experience it was to meet in a 'haimisha' and informal setting with such bright and engaged students. I wish we had a 'house' like that at Harvard," he said.

Assistance stimulates post-war business revival in northern Israel

Nahariya resident Michal Hirsch will be expanding her birthday cake business despite last summer's war in northern Israel.

Business is booming for Michal Hirsch, 30. Hirsch, who specializes in custom-designed birthday cakes, will be expanding her business and opening her own studio/kitchen. But in July and August last year, Michal could not have dreamed of this expansion. During the war in northern Israel, few people were celebrating, as Hezbollah missiles rained down on Nahariya, where Michal lives.

"I had no income in the summer," she recalls, "and even after the ceasefire it took a few months for customers to recover. The turning point for me was in the fall when I applied, and immediately received, a grant from the Jewish Agency for Israel to compensate me for some of the economic damage to my business."

"We had been digging deep into our savings," Michal adds, "and there was a feeling nobody cared about our plight. The grant from the Jewish Agency – UJA Federation's overseas agency - really restored my strength and motivation. I felt I had to carry on for the sake of the people so far away who had given me this gift."

Immediate emergency grants to very small, independent businesses was one of the first steps the Jewish Agency took after the war – with the generous support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other North American Jewish Federations.

UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 – chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks – raised $81 million, with $20 million earmarked for Israel's needs.

For the duration of the war, work was at a standstill in the North; small business owners and self-employed trade people were in financial ruin. They were unable to pay their bills or support their families.

Immediate emergency assistance from the Jewish Agency gave hard-working individuals the ability to pay some of their basic bills, including water, electricity and rent, and, thus, jump-start the process of rehabilitating their businesses.

"I grew up in my Moroccan grandmother's kitchen," explains Michal. "And ever since I can remember I loved cooking – especially baking. I always had a talent for designing cakes and there is no greater pleasure than seeing the look of wonder on a small child's face when they first see their birthday cake."

But there were no looks of wonder during this summer's war in Lebanon. Sounds of song and gleeful birthday parties were replaced by horror, tears and fear as missiles slammed into buildings. During the barrage, Michal moved to her brother's home in the center of the country with her two children, three-year-old Ariel and then 11-month-old Daniel, while her husband, Nir, continued working as a TV repairman.

Michal has just been accepted into the small business incubator at the MATI Business Development Center in Akko. Established with support from the Jewish Agency, the Center seeks to strengthen the region's economy through assistance in opening new businesses and expanding existing ones. She will receive subsidized studio/kitchen and business coaching.

"I'm relishing the challenge," insists Michal. "I really feel that my business has major growth potential."

UJA Federation makes it a family affair in Israel

Fifty-nine Torontonians took part in UJA Federation's Family Mission to Israel from December 24 to January 2. Highlights of the mission included meetings with young people who benefited from UJA Federation projects in Kfar Gvirol, Kiryat Moshe and UJA Federation's partnership region of Eilat/Eilot; taking part in an archaeological dig, a visit to the Uvda Air Force Base, and a bnei mitzvah ceremony at the Southern Wall. (Pictured left to right) are mission participants celebrating their bar and bat mitzvahs in Israel: Peri Fenwick, Lauren White, Robert Yellin, Joey Lieberman, Shira Springer and Yoram Kerbel.

McGill program expands activities in Middle East

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

The McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building is expanding its activities by assisting in the creation of several new social advocacy centres in the West Bank and Jordan.

Award-winning social-work professor Jim Torczyner, who directs the program, will travel to the region this month to discuss the details of the new centres with local experts.

The McGill program provides graduate fellowships to Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian social workers who then return to work in storefront centres in their home countries. There are currently six such centres in east and west Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva, Lod, Nablus and Amman, and a "rights mobile" that travels to Bedouin villages. The centres help poor and marginalized people access government benefits, and facilitate their involvement in the design and advocacy of social policy.

"We try to enable people, particularly the marginalized, to have their voice heard in the public debate," says Barbara Epstein, director of Community Advocacy, the organization that runs the centres in Israel.

In the past, Epstein's group has successfully lobbied for legislation to provide elderly welfare recipients with discounted medication and social housing policies, including a guaranteed minimum standard of repairs and maintenance from public housing corporations.

Community Advocacy's current projects include the addition of dental care to the national health-care package, bringing running water to Bedouin villages, re-opening informal education centres in Lod and helping with legal opposition to the Wisconsin Plan, a controversial welfare-to-work program run by the private sector.

The centres also do outreach to the elderly and immigrant communities who are unaware of their entitlements as a result of language barriers.

In Jerusalem, Epstein says, many elderly people remain without heating, since subsidies are publicized only in the Hebrew press.

The Community Advocacy centres were modelled on Montreal's Project Genesis, a rights-based social advocacy organization founded by Torczyner in 1975. Torczyner brought Project Genesis to Israel in 1993 as part of Project Renewal, a program that paired the Jewish community of Montreal with the city of Be'er Sheva.

Following the 1994 peace treaty between Israel and Jordan, Torczyner helped the University of Jordan create a school of social work and an associated social advocacy centre by bringing Jordanian and Israeli scholars to McGill on fellowships, forming the basis for the Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building.

Since 1998, the program has also included Palestinians in conjunction with Al-Quds and An-Najah universities. Approximately 40 fellows have graduated from the program thus far, and have gone back to practise in the Middle East.

During his upcoming visit to the region, Torczyner will also be recruiting 12 new fellowship candidates for the program.

Funding for the program is provided largely by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), which has recently recommitted an annual $3-million dollar grant. According to Torczyner, CIDA has come to rely on the McGill Middle East program to provide humanitarian aid in the region, leading to the creation of more centres. At present, the centres help some 75,000 people each year by providing social rights education and social-policy advocacy.

Epstein stresses the benefits of the McGill fellowships, despite their high cost.

"It gives people perspective," she says, "to see that the kinds of issues that we work on cut across the region and that poor people and marginalized people have the same problems.

"In Israel we're a very small pond," she adds, "and so meeting other people, getting other perspectives, and learning about different ways of doing things is very important for the creative process here."

Torczyner also defends the program against criticism that immediate humanitarian aid is more important than academic fellowships.

"To sustain a response to humanitarian need you need to create organizations," he argues, "and to do that you need people who are really trained, like we can do at McGill."

Winnipeg CJA campaign sets new record

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign has set a new record for the 11th year in a row.

As of the end of December, this year's tally stood at $5,025,335 – once again surpassing the campaign goal, which this year was $5 million. The drive also raised an additional $2,322,863 for the Israel Crisis Fund, which will help repair the damage to northern Israel sustained in last summer's war with Hezbollah.

CJA leadership has upped the ante by at least $250,000 every year over the last 11 years, and they've met or exceeded the goal every time.

"This is an amazing community," said Elaine Goldstine, CJA's executive director. "It is wonderful to be able to raise the money we need to support those in need in our community and in Israel."

Ian Goldstine, CJA chair for 2006 (and Elaine Goldstine's husband), complimented volunteer canvassers and donors for their commitment.

"This community always comes to the fore," he said. "We did it again even more so this year with the Israel Crisis Fund added."

The community has also shown its generosity in other ways recently.

Last month, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba announced two new gifts of $500,000 each from David and Ruth Asper and the late Sylvia Markel.

Markel was a longtime Winnipegger who died in October 2005.

She left a $500,000 bequest to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to establish two scholarships in the fields of medical science and medical education.

The Joseph Sier Award will be distributed annually to the University of Manitoba's faculty of medicine for the education of one or more trainees studying hematology and medical oncology.

The Merk and Sylvia Markel Award will be distributed annually to U of M's faculty of medicine to help educate one or more trainees in cardiology.

The scholarships were inspired by the untimely deaths of both of Markel's husbands, Joseph Sier and Merk Markel, and reflects her lifelong interest in medicine and education. She had three brothers – Max, Sydney and Lyonel Israels – who were doctors, and a fourth brother, Monte Israels, who was a lawyer.

The David and Ruth Asper Fund primarily supports the Jewish Child and Family Service's Helping Hand Initiative, which was created by the late Israel Asper (David's father) four years ago. The senior Asper's vision was a free program, modelled on those that operated in the earlier years of the Jewish community, that would provide small loans to people needing short-term financial help.

"We are looking forward to growing our fund and expanding our reach to help other organizations as well," David Asper said.

Meanwhile, in an update on the late Israel Asper's last major initiative – a proposed Canadian Museum for Human Rights to be built in Winnipeg – Asper Foundation spokesperson Kim Jasper said the campaign to build the museum is going well, noting that it has received sizeable contributions in each of the last three months: $5 million came in October, $2.7 million more in November and a further $3 million – contributed by the Richardson family, Winnipeg's wealthiest family, and the Richardson Family Foundation – in December.

"We have $70 million in private sector pledges so far, with $90 million more in private funding still to be raised," Jasper said.

The project is expected to cost $311 million, with the three levels of government contributing $151 million.

One of the concerns that has been raised about the project's viability was whether the federal government would commit to providing annual operating funds, as it does for some national museums based in Ottawa.

"We are in continuous discussion with the government," Jasper said.

"We are encouraged by recent public comments from Bev Oda, the minister of culture, about the government looking for opportunities to fund federal institutions outside of Ottawa in partnership with other community institutions."

Last month, the Winnipeg Free Press cited "senior government sources" as saying the Harper government is prepared to designate the museum a national institution run by Ottawa in order to make it eligible for annual funding.

If all goes well, Jasper said, the museum's supporters hope to break ground some time this year and have the museum open in 2010.

Newcomers get a warm welcome to Winnipeg

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — "An overwhelming majority of new immigrants who come to Winnipeg end up staying here, as long as they find jobs, schools for their kids, and feel happy," says Boris Nakhamchin, the community immigration officer of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

"When one person comes, they tell a friend, and that person tells someone else. In this way, more and more people come through word of mouth – quiet channels of communication."

Alejandra Mozes, her husband Ilan, her daughter Maia, and their son Eial, came to Canada by way of Argentina and Israel.

Daniel Markus, who is from Brazil, immigrated in September 2006. Finding a job and making friends here has given him reasons to put down some roots.

"The Winnipeg Jewish community is so welcoming. I really like it. At first, I was just curious about gaining some professional experience abroad, but finding secure employment and a solid social life has given me reason to want to stay," he says.

Markus, who has a bachelor in social communications, looked into the Winnipeg job market on his first visit here. "Right from the beginning, I got a lot of help from the Jewish community – from orientation, to the exploratory visit, to making the final decision and arrangements," he says.

The "exploratory visit" is a service provided by the Jewish Federation's immigration department. People considering moving here can come for a seven- to 10-day visit, during which they are put in contact with people of their age and profession.

During his visit, Markus attended a GrowWinnipeg job fair, at which three companies offered him jobs. GrowWinnipeg is an employment networking program operated by federation.

Markus is now working for Huston Recruiting Services, he is taking the federation's young adult division's leadership development course, and he is involved with Etz Chayim Synagogue, thinking up new ways to attract more people to its daily minyan.

"People from the community have been just fantastic to me. I received many invitations to go to people's homes for the Jewish holidays," says Markus. "I feel like I now have many new mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers and friends. I feel very comfortable in calling Winnipeg my home."

Elena Grinshteyn came to Winnipeg five months ago with her husband and daughter. Originally from Ukraine, she lived in Israel for 15 years. "I loved this city [Winnipeg] as soon as I arrived," she says. "It is such a warm, friendly, and caring community. And the people here really make you feel at home."

Grinshteyn has just found employment, working as a campaign co-ordinator for Ralph Corner House, a university women's book club.

Vladimir Shterenberg arrived here in September 2005 with his wife, Tatiana, and their two children. Shterenberg moved to Israel from Ukraine in 1994. "Overall, my experience settling in Winnipeg was quite good. Within a couple of months, I found work as a computer programmer," he says. "One of my friends from back home will be moving here in April, and a couple more are planning on coming soon after that. There are a lot of people with similar background to me who I have met, and am now friends with here."

Alejandra Mozes moved to Winnipeg in November 2002, along with her husband, Ilan, and their children, Maia and Eial. Mozes, who was born in Argentina, was living on Kibbutz Beit Keshet in Israel with her family. "We decided to leave the kibbutz because it was moving toward privatization. So we felt it was better to move to Canada and live in a real city if the kibbutz was going to become like a city anyway," she says.

"We chose Winnipeg because I have a sister who moved here and always said good things about it. The Jewish community here did a great job in helping us to get settled – much more than we ever expected. The week of Dec. 11, 2006, my family and me became Canadian citizens. It was a beautiful ceremony, and an incredible feeling."

Cliff Huot, a placement consultant with the GrowWinnipeg Initiative, assists newcomers in finding employment. He says that the majority of immigrants he helps are couples with young children from the former Soviet Union who immigrated to Israel in the 1990s and left there for Canada.

Manitoba's goal was to welcome 10,000 new immigrants in 2006, a target it nearly met, and it will increase that target by 1,000 a year for 10 years. Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, the federation's planning director/ GrowWinnipeg co-ordinator, says that "in 1999, only 95 new Jewish immigrants came to Winnipeg. In 2002, 215 people came to this city. And now, in 2006, an estimated 328 Jews have made Winnipeg their home."

Report on Iran strike gets mixed reaction

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A sensational 2,250-word report in the Jan. 7 Sunday Times in Britain, "Focus: Mission Iran," by Uzi Mahnaimi and Sarah Baxter, claimed that Israel was planning tactical nuclear strikes against Iranian nuclear weapons sites. Officially denied by Israel, the piece sparked a mixed reaction in the Canadian media. Some outlets buried the story while others featured it prominently.

Successive Israeli governments have viewed Iran's nuclear ambitions as an imminent existential threat and have vowed that Iran must be stopped one way or another. The preferred option is concerted diplomatic action by the international community, such as the recently passed UN Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions against Iran's nuclear program. But if that fails, and if other countries that are also threatened, including the United States and some in Europe, don't take stronger measures, Israel may have to act alone.

But would Israel, which has always declared that it would never be the first to "introduce" nuclear weapons into the region, actually use tactical nuclear devices against Iran's nuclear sites, as the Times article suggested?

CBC's Jan. 7 Sunday Night broadcast downplayed the story, giving it a brief mention. In contrast, CTV's National News (Jan. 7) ran a report by Middle East correspondent Janis Mackey Frayer exploring the Times' speculation.

Mackey Frayer included a clip from Israeli radio personality Menashe Amir, whose show on the Iranian regime broadcasts from Jerusalem into Iran, entirely in Farsi. Amir said: "There is no doubt that the Israeli Air Force all the time prepares the proper programs, plans for doing the job."

Mackey Frayer also interviewed Israeli cabinet minister Ze'ev Boim, who remarked: "We will support the international community and we support [its efforts] to stop the uranium nuclear plan."

Less diplomatically guarded was former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu. After airing a clip of Netanyahu saying that "the world cannot tolerate" a nuclear Iran, Mackey Frayer asked: "Does that leave a military option?" Netanyahu's reply: "It leaves whatever options are necessary to make sure that this doesn't happen."

Mackey Frayer concluded: "No matter how grave the threat, an Israeli strike on Iran is seen as an absolute last resort. And if such an Israeli plan does exist as more than just a threat, chances are they wouldn't tell a reporter."

Similarly, while the Jan. 8 Globe and Mail ran an Associated Press news brief on the Times report, the same day's National Post included the front-page story "Israel denies plans to bomb Iranian sites" by David Rosenberg of Bloomberg News.

Rosenberg quoted an unnamed "senior Israeli official" who dismissed the Times report: "This is absurd information coming from a newspaper that has already in the past distinguished itself with sensationalist headlines that in the end amounted to nothing. To think that we will launch an atomic attack against Iran and on top of that that we would reveal it in advance to a foreign newspaper is doubly ridiculous."

Some Mideast analysts believe that Israel may have leaked such a report, then officially denied it, to get the international community focused on the threat an Iranian nuclear attack poses – and not only to Israel.

Others caution that even if no Israeli official had a hand in this story, the fact remains that Israel, repeatedly threatened by Iran, cannot stand idly by forever as Iran marches ahead with plans to obtain the bomb.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Mama's cooking has changed over the years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Susan Mendelson always has lots of food at her book launches.

The Vancouver-based author and caterer who spent her formative years in Toronto usually prepares a huge spread from the recipes in the book she's launching. There's rarely a shortage of people or food, she says.

Such was the case at the recent Toronto launch of Mendelson's latest book Mama Now Cooks like This (Whitecap, 2006).

She laughs, as she zip-locks the last remnants of a finger-food feast from the launch. "I invited 40 people and they ate for 150 people."

Who could blame them? Mendelson's delectable offerings included caviar pie, risotto balls, mushroom nut paté paired with savoury shortbread and figs, brie en croute served with maple syrup and cocktail knishes and latkes.

But the pièce de résistance that evening was the sweet table laden with chocolate truffle cookies, brownies, macaroons, and her trademark dessert – Nanaimo bars.

Indeed, Mendelson is credited with putting the Nanaimo bar on the culinary food map. She says she didn't invent this three-layer bar cookie – she got the recipe from a schoolmate who came from Nanaimo. But she was the first person to sell the famed treat commercially and publish the recipe.

It's been some 30 years since Mendelson began selling the Nanaimo bar. At the time, she was managing the Vancouver East Cultural Centre and selling the bars along with carrot cake and cheesecake at intermission. They were so popular that people would call up to buy tickets to events and try to reserve a piece of cheesecake as well, Mendelson recalls. "Of course we couldn't do that. At intermission there would be a stampede to the snack bar."

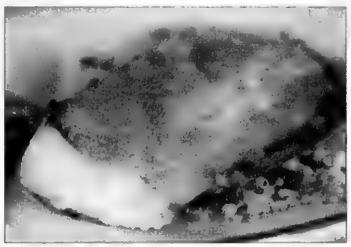
Word of Mendelson's baking prowess spread, and she was soon invited to share her recipes on CBC's afternoon radio show. After a few guest appearances, she was given a regular spot, called ACE in the Kitchen, a gig that continued until 1983.

Her first book, Mama Never Cooked Like This, published in 1980, was a compilation of the CBC recipes, Mendelson says. It sold more than 100,000 copies.

And yes, she says, she made money – enough to purchase her first house.

catapulted her to nationwide cookbook author stardom. She's published a total of 10 books over the last 26 years.

Despite a busy business schedule, Mendelson still manages to squeeze in time to write cookbooks. Last year, she and her sister, Rena Mendelson, a professor of nutrition at Ryerson University, updated and re-released their children's nutrition book, Food to Grow On (HarperCollins 2005). It was originally published in 1994.



Mama Never Cooked Like This

Mama Now Cooks Like This, Mendelson's 10th cookbook, pays homage to her first book, she says. "When I wrote Mama Never Cooked Like This, I was teasing my mother. But now I'm the mother of the house. I have a daughter and a stepson and a daughter-in-law. This is the way I cook."

LAZY GOURMET MOCHA NANAIMO BARS

Layer One
½ cup butter
½ cup sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla
2 tbsp. cocoa powder
2 cups graham wafer crumbs
1 cup long thread coconut
½ cup chopped walnut or pecans.

Grease an 9-in. square baking pan. Mix together butter, sugar, egg, vanilla and cocoa powder and set over boiling water. Stir until slightly thickened. Add graham wafer crumbs, coconut and nuts. Press mixture in prepared pan, pressing down to spread evenly. Let stand 15 minutes.

Layer Two
¼ cup butter, softened
2 tbsp. milk
2 cups icing sugar
2 tsp. instant coffee dissolved in 2 tbsp. of hot coffee
2 tbsp. custard powder
1 tsp. coffee liqueur (optional)

Mix the butter, milk, icing sugar, coffee, custard powder and liqueur well together and spread over Layer One.

Layer Three
6 oz. semi-sweet chocolate
1 tbsp. butter

Melt chocolate over hot (not boiling) water. Very slowly add the butter. Spread this chocolate layer over Layer Two. Refrigerate and then cut into squares. Makes 20 bars.

SUSAN AND PETER'S HAZELNUT LEMON HALIBUT

1 cup fine dry bread crumbs
½ cup coarsely chopped hazelnuts
salt and pepper to taste
grated rind of lemon
2-3 tbsp. parsley
juice of 1 lemon
2 lbs. halibut fillets
½ cup flour
salt and pepper
1 egg
2 tbsp. half and half cream
4 to 6 tbsp. butter or oil or a combination of both lemon slices
fresh parsley sprigs

Preheat oven to 350. Mix together bread crumbs, hazelnuts, salt and pepper, lemon rind and parsley and set aside.

Squeeze lemon juice over the halibut. Season flour with salt and pepper and dredge fish in seasoned flour. Beat together egg and cream.

Dip fish in egg mixture and then the hazelnut mixture. Fry halibut in butter or oil 3 to 4 minutes on each side depending on the thickness of the fish. Fish should be light brown and crisp. Transfer fish to baking dish. Bake in preheated oven 8 to 10 minutes. Garnish with lemon slices and parsley sprigs. Serve immediately. Makes 6 servings.

MIRA'S FAVOURITE COLESLAW

This will last several days in the refrigerator.

¼ cup low fat or fat free mayonnaise
¼ cup white vinegar
¼ cup white sugar
2 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. black pepper
1 medium carrot
1 medium green cabbage
½ medium purple cabbage
1 small sweet onion
1 red pepper, seeded
½ cup toasted sunflower seeds

Mix together well the mayonnaise, vinegar, sugar, salt and pepper. Blend well. Finely shred all the vegetables in a food processor or chop finely by hand.

Add the dressing and mix well. Let stand in the refrigerator 2 to 4 hours before serving. Add sunflower seeds for extra crunch. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Olmert, Rice agree to hold three-way summit with Abbas

By ALUF BENN and YOAV STERN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, met for three hours Monday and agreed to hold a three-way summit with Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas in the near future, U.S. officials said.

A senior U.S. official in Rice's delegation said the goal of the trilateral meeting will be to have "a conversation about the political horizon leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters on the record.

Olmert's spokesperson, Miri Eisin, confirmed that Olmert had agreed "in principle" to attend the summit. But she said no date or place had been set.

The U.S. official said the meeting would likely take place in the next three or four weeks somewhere in the Middle East.

Palestinian officials were not immediately available for comment.

Speaking to his Kadima party members after meeting with Rice, Olmert said that the internationally brokered "road map" plan continues to be the basis for the peace process, and that there is "no substitute for bilateral negotiations" with the Palestinians.

He said that if a Palestinian unity government made up of Hamas and Fatah agreed to accept the three key international demands for recognition of Israel, the renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous accords, then negotiations could be possible.

No details of the talks between Olmert and Rice were formally released, but the prime minister had been expected to tell the secretary of state that Israel would take "unprecedented steps" vis-a-vis the Palestinians, if the Hamas-led PA government met the criteria spelled out in the road map by the Quartet – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

The meeting between Olmert and Rice was also called to discuss ways to boost Abbas' standing, in order to further the diplomatic process between Israel and the Palestinians.

The prime minister was to stress that his is a "peace government," but if the Palestinians do not meet the international preconditions, it is impossible to proceed. Olmert was also expected to warn that the establishment of a Palestinian government of national unity that does not adopt the preconditions set by the Quartet will bring an end to Israel's efforts to support Abbas.

On Sunday, Shin Bet security service chief Yuval Diskin told the cabinet that the violence between the Palestinian Fatah and Hamas factions, which led to the death of 20 people last week, was considered by the Palestinians as crossing a "red line." He added that this could result in greater flexibility on the part of the Palestinian leaders in agreeing on a government of national unity.

Political sources in Jerusalem said on Sunday that "the Palestinians are now talking about the division of ministerial portfolios in the new government, without committing themselves to accept the Quartet preconditions."

Meanwhile, in an interview on Channel 10 on Sunday, Rice said the road map must be implemented and there is no reason to skip over any of its stages. Her comment was in part referring to an earlier rejection by Abbas of the idea that the second stage of the road map – calling for a Palestinian state based on temporary borders – was a realistic possibility at this stage.

She also said that in her talks with Abbas on Sunday, he had reiterated his wish and willingness to carry out Palestinian obligations laid out in the road map.

Following their meeting in Ramallah on Sunday, Abbas announced that he would not agree to a Palestinian state within temporary borders, as is proposed in the second stage of the road map. "We do not consider this possibility a realistic one that we can build on," he said.

Other Palestinian officials also voiced their opposition to such an arrangement, saying that it would prevent progress toward a final settlement.

Rice said the United States intends to deepen its involvement in the peace process, aiming to restart it on the basis of the road map.

There have been reports in recent days that a summit of Fatah and Hamas leaders is being organized in Damascus, with the specific aim of finalizing an agreement for a national unity government. Abbas denied that such a meeting is scheduled to take place.

According to the reports, the leader of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Sheikh Mohammed Akef, was instrumental in convincing Khaled Meshal, the head of the Hamas political bureau, and Abbas to meet in order to iron out their differences.

Downtown Jerusalem getting a $100-million facelift

By GAIL LICHTMAN
(IPS)

JERUSALEM — Throughout history, no other city has been as beloved and fought over as Jerusalem, having been besieged dozens of times and destroyed, at least partially, on 32 different occasions.

The countless terror attacks of the past two decades have also left their mark on the city, with a siphoning off of shopping and entertainment to suburban malls and a switch from residential to business use. Compounding the problem has been Jerusalem's high poverty rate – 33 per cent as compared to 19.5 per cent nationwide – and the urban flight of some 150,000 residents, mostly young families and singles.

It is hoped, however, that all that is about to change as downtown Jerusalem, from Jaffa Gate to the Machane Yehuda market, looks forward to getting a $100- million facelift.

Zion Square, the epicentre of downtown Jerusalem and a hangout for disenfranchised youth, will receive a major facelift and include installation of contemporary artwork by Ron Arad.

The revitalization is being spearheaded by the Eden Company – a subsidiary of the municipally owned Jerusalem Development Authority set up specifically to rehabilitate the downtown area – in partnership with the Jerusalem Foundation.

This facelift is in addition to $450 million being invested by the Jerusalem municipality in a new light rail system that will ease access to the city centre and turn Jaffa Road into a pedestrian mall.

"Jerusalem is aiming for a total revitalization of the city centre – to make it more accessible transportation-wise, to renovate and upgrade infrastructure and to bring residents, culture, employment and business back into the area," says Asaf Vitman, CEO of the Eden Company. "Already more than one million square metres of new building have been approved for the area."

Working in tandem with Eden, the Jerusalem Foundation, now celebrating its 40th year, has committed itself to financing much of the project. "Since 1967, the Jerusalem Foundation has taken an active role in the development of all areas of Jerusalem, particularly the city centre," notes foundation president Ruth Cheshin. "So it was natural that we would be involved in the city centre rejuvenation, too."

To bring residents, and especially young people, back to downtown Jerusalem, two new initiatives are in the pipeline – the relocation of the Bezalel Art Academy to the Russian Compound and the building of subsidized student housing in the Hillel Street area.

The Bezalel Art Academy, Israel's foremost academy of fine arts, design and architecture, was founded in 1903. For years, the academy functioned out of its original historic building in the heart of downtown. In the early 1990s, Bezalel relocated to modern, more spacious premises on Mount Scopus, next to the Hebrew University. Its departure, however, created a cultural hole in the city's urban fabric. The return of Bezalel to the city, to a new campus in the Russian Compound, the centre of Jerusalem's nightlife, aims to repair this hole.

The new campus will house classrooms, workshops, studios, a library, television and recording studios and a multi-purpose auditorium, as well as host public exhibits. The $12-million project will also include a commercial area.

A six-storey, 120-unit student dormitory, to be built on Ben Sira Street, just off Hillel Street, will provide subsidized housing and serve as a centre for youth programming. Construction is set to begin in 2007.

In the meantime, the Eden Company is offering grants of $100 a month to encourage students to rent apartments in the centre. In 2004, only 150 students were living downtown. With the initiation of the grants in 2005, that number jumped to 600 and in 2006 to 1,000. "This is one of the biggest revolutions in the city centre in recent years," says Vitman.

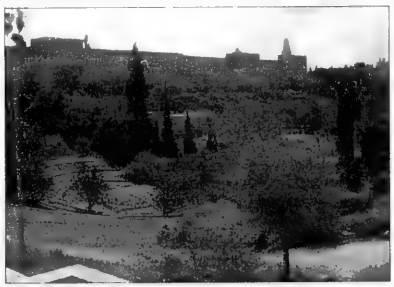
As an additional boost to culture in the city centre, a new museum of contemporary art is being developed, also to be located in the Russian Compound.

In addition, the three main squares along Jaffa Road – Zahal, Zion and the Davidka – will also undergo major renovations and redesign. "We chose to adopt the redevelopment of the city's central squares as our major contribution to downtown revitalization," says Cheshin. "Each of these squares has its own unique character, which we feel is important to develop."

Zahal Square, located at the junction where city hall meets the Old City walls, is being redesigned by world-renowned architect Moshe Safdie. The Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, whose president, David J. Azrieli, is himself a noted Jerusalem architect, has committed itself to raising $2 million for the project, which will include green passages, stone-paved walkways and an amphitheatre. In addition, the Canadians will be donating $200,000 toward social services for youth at risk. The redesign is expected to be completed sometime between October 2007 and February 2008.

Zion Square, where Ben Yehuda Street and Jaffa Road meet, was once "the" meeting place for Jerusalemites, but is now more commonly known as a hangout for disenfranchised youth. Israeli-born architect-sculptor Ron Arad, a professor at London's Royal College of Art, has developed a plan to return the square to its former glory, which centres around one of his contemporary sculptures. Combining playful forms and advanced technologies, Arad wants to send a message through his art to the youth who gather in the square, to challenge them to explore new horizons, as he does in his work.

Davidka Square commemorates the homemade mortar weapon that saved Jerusalem during the War of Independence. The new design of the square, by award-winning Mexican architect Ricardo Legorreta, will combine stone columns and water elements to create a pleasant oasis in the centre of the city. The mixture of red stone, blue water and green trees will create a feeling of space, air and colour. To help maintain the square, a special endowment fund is being created.



The Mamilla Valley will form a green space connecting the Old City with a new tree-lined promenade and an amphitheatre garden, incorporating water elements plus sound and light components.

Over the years, with the decline of the downtown area, many upscale businesses left for the suburban malls. The revitalization of the centre, plus the long-awaited opening of the Mamilla Mall across from the Jaffa Gate (now set for April 2007), have upped the attractiveness of this area for retail businesses. Vitman says that a number of well-known companies are now looking to open stores in downtown Jerusalem.

The Jerusalem Foundation is also undertaking another project – development of the Mamilla Valley, between King David Street and the Jaffa Gate. The foundation's Jan Mitchell Gardens will be incorporated into the Mamilla project design, and will form a green space connecting the Old City with a new tree-lined promenade. An amphitheatre garden, incorporating water elements plus sound and light components, will provide a new meeting place facing the ancient walls. The garden will serve as a natural connection to the artists' workshops, a once-popular tourist attraction now also undergoing renewal.

When all the work is completed, Jerusalem will have a more vibrant, pulsating downtown area that will truly reflect the city's status as Israel's capital and the eternal capital of the Jewish people.

'We maintain a profound love for the Chinese people'

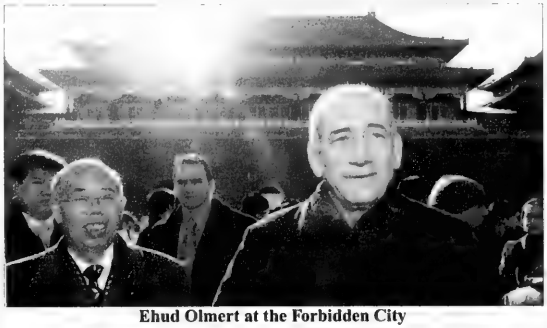
Senior officials present at the meetings said the Chinese position is that Tehran should not be allowed to develop military nuclear capabilities. Olmert was told by his Chinese hosts that the permanent member of the UN Security Council would do everything possible to find a solution conforming to the spirit of Resolution 1737, which was passed last month and demands that Iran cease working to enrich uranium.

Olmert told Hu that Israel prefers a diplomatic solution and hopes Iran will be blocked via diplomatic pressure. He also commended China for its Security Council vote on Resolution 1737, which imposed "soft" sanctions on Iran for violating an international call to cease uranium enrichment.



Ehud Olmert at the Forbidden City
[Israel Sun photos by Avi Ohayon / GPO]

For his part, Hu also condemned Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's denial of the Holocaust, and recalled the 1930s and 1940s, when China and the Jews both opposed Germany and Japan.

Like Russia, China has been a bit of a wild card at the UN Security Council, which has been debating sanctions designed to curb Iran's atomic ambitions.

The council unanimously passed a resolution last month limiting Iran's trade in sensitive nuclear materials that could be used for bomb-making, but China appears more willing than western powers to believe Tehran's claims that its plans are peaceful, and it's always ready to return to negotiations with the Islamic republic.

Israel sees Iran as an existential threat, given the country's presumed drive for nuclear weapons and its repeated calls for Israel's destruction.

Wen also raised the topic of Israeli-Palestinian peace prospects, advising mutual restraint.

"History and reality show that violence cannot solve the Middle East problem, but rather they only increase hatred and alienation," Wen said, according to Chinese media.

The Chinese leader offered to facilitate talks between the two sides.

Since they first hosted Jewish traders in the ninth century, the Chinese have displayed an intense interest, bordering on philo-Semitism, in a people they consider their "western counterparts" in terms of enterprise and cultural depth.

The Israeli prime minister knows this first hand: his parents, Mordechai and Bella, were among thousands of Jews who fled persecution in Russia in the early 20th century, settling in the northern Chinese city of Harbin before moving on to the nascent Zionist state.

The Harbin Jews, as well as Jews who fled Nazi Europe and settled in other Chinese areas such as Shanghai and Kaifeng, experienced almost unprecedented levels of prosperity and security. Olmert's parents received professional training in China, even speaking some Mandarin at home.

"Chinese culture became a part of our family's tradition. It is my first memory from my childhood in Israel," Olmert told China's Xinhua news agency.

"We maintain a profound love for the Chinese people and are grateful for the warmth and friendship offered to the Jewish people in the early years of the 20th century and World War II from the people of Shanghai and Harbin."

Despite its ties to the Jewish Diaspora, China was late in recognizing the State of Israel. It normalized relations only in 1992, after interim peace talks were well under way between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Beijing long had courted.

While it has consistently argued for peaceful conflict resolution in the Middle East, China has been out of step with the United States and European Union.

"Chinese people believe that peace, development and co-operation is the irreversible trend of our times," Chen Yonglong, China's ambassador to Israel, said last year, seemingly ignoring some of the more radical strains of Islamism.

One major blunder by Beijing, as far as Israel and other western powers are concerned, was to host Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar after his radical Hamas faction took power last March.

Critics say invitations to Hamas such as the one from China give the terrorist group much-needed legitimacy.

China used the visit to urge Hamas to soften its stand against the Jewish state but, as expected, it was rebuffed.

Israel and China enjoy robust co-operation in commerce and scientific areas such as agriculture and high-tech.

Their relationship also had a major defence component until the United States stepped in, fearing for the safety of its ally, Taiwan, and for the survival of its arms firms in the face of stiff Israeli competition.

Under U.S. pressure, Israel in 2000 cancelled a $1-billion sale of advanced radar systems to China. It has since faced further Pentagon ire after providing maintenance service for a fleet of Israeli-made drones that it sold to China in the 1990s.

According to Israeli defence sources, the scale of military-related trade with China since 2000 has been minimal – $16 million in all.

Yet other trade is flourishing, and high-level Chinese delegations have visited Israel in the past 18 months, driven largely by interest in civilian technologies, Ha'aretz reported. Chinese officials say they want to double the quantity in coming years.

At last week's meeting, Wen and Olmert signed several documents for co-operation, including a cultural agreement, an export agreement allowing Israel to export citrus to China and a memorandum of understanding on water power between the city of Beijing and Israel's industry, trade and labour ministry.

Olmert paid a visit to a model farm set up by Israelis near Beijing, and he visited the Great Wall and the Forbidden City in Beijing. He was expected to announce that Israel will open a consulate in the province of Guangzhou, which is home to high-tech parks, Ha'aretz reported.

Jews resign over Carter book

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Fourteen Jewish members of the board of councillors at the Carter Center in Atlanta resigned last week to protest former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's new book blaming Israel for the failure of Mideast peace efforts.

In a letter to Carter, the group said he has abandoned his role as a peace broker in favour of malicious partisan advocacy, portraying the complex Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a "purely one-sided affair" that Israel bears full responsibility for resolving.

They also cite a "disturbing" passage from Carter's book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, that appears to call on Palestinians to end terrorism only if Israel abides by international law and the "road map," a peace plan guided by the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia. The passage appears to condone violence against Israelis, the signatories said.

"We can no longer support your strident and uncompromising position," the letter said. "This is not the Carter Center or the Jimmy Carter we came to respect and support."

Among those resigning were prominent members of Atlanta's Jewish community.

Founded in 1982 by Carter and his wife, Rosalynn, the Carter Center promotes conflict resolution, freedom, democracy and global health. Its $36-million (US) operating budget comes from corporate and private philanthropic sources, and prominent Arab donors – including Saudi Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal Abdulaziz and the governments of Oman, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates – have also contributed more than $1 million.

The resignations add to the criticism that has engulfed the centre since the publication of Carter's book, which critics say is biased, inaccurate, misleading and missing key historical facts.

The board members followed the lead of Ken Stein, a professor who resigned as a Carter Center fellow last month. Stein, a former executive director of the centre who had been associated with Carter for 23 years, wrote in his resignation letter that Carter's book is "replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions, and simply invented segments."

Israel Briefs

First Arab minister

Israel's first Arab minister was appointed. Labor Party leader Amir Peretz named Ghaleb Majadle to replace Science, Culture and Sport Minister Ophir Pines-Paz, who resigned two months ago to protest Yisrael Beiteinu's entry into Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's coalition. Majadle, 53, who hailed the news as a step toward equality for Israeli Arabs, was elected to the Knesset in 2004 and has led its environment committee.

Regional conflicts predicted

This year will produce strategic regional threats, the Israeli army said in an annual assessment released last week. The army predicted overall regional stability will deteriorate in 2007, Iran will achieve nuclear capability and Israel could enter a conflict with Syria and Hezbollah. The Israel Defence Forces also identified elements of global jihad in the region, with up to 100 Al Qaeda operatives in Lebanon.

Qassams get longer reach?

Palestinian terrorists in Gaza may soon be able to launch rockets farther north into Israel, the Israeli army warned. The rockets could soon reach even beyond the port city of Ashkelon about 10 miles north of Gaza, new army estimates say. Most now fall around the town of Sderot, about two miles beyond the border with Gaza. Israeli security branches say Islamic Jihad, which has had the most success in developing long-range rockets, may be planning to stockpile them in the event of future escalation of fighting with Israel.

Identifying suicide bombers

Thirty-eight out of 272 suicide bombings in Israel were carried out by Palestinians who had obtained Israeli citizenship through family unification, the Shin Bet security service said. An intelligence official reported the numbers to the Knesset internal affairs and environment committee, which was discussing whether to extend a temporary law banning automatic family reunification when Palestinians marry Israelis.

Olmert to be investigated?

Ehud Olmert reportedly will be probed for alleged improprieties during the government sale of a controlling interest in Bank Leumi. The Jerusalem Post reported that Attorney General Menachem Mazuz has recused himself from the criminal investigation, as his sister may also be suspected of impropriety. State Attorney Eran Shendar was to announce the investigation when Olmert returned from China.

Wolf Prizes announced

Israeli Education Minister and Wolf Foundation Council chairwoman Yuli Tamir announced that the 2007 chemistry prize would go to Ada Yonath of the Weizmann Institute of Science and George Feher of the University of California at San Diego for structural discoveries of the "ribosomal machinery of peptide-bond formation and the light-driven primary processes in photosynthesis." The art prize will be given to Italian artist Michelangelo Pistoletto "for his ever-inventive career as an artist, educator and activist, whose restless intelligence has created prescient forms of art that contribute to fresh understanding of the world." The $100,000 prizes will be presented at a Knesset ceremony May 13.

Barak declares candidacy

Ehud Barak last week announced his candidacy to lead Israel's Labor Party. The former prime minister left politics after losing the premiership to Ariel Sharon in 2000. Several high-ranking Labor officials have supported Barak's candidacy. He plans to present himself as the best candidate for defence minister, feeding off nationwide discontent with Amir Peretz, who currently has the post as head of the party.

Antibiotic breakthrough?

Scientists at the Weizmann Institute of Science have developed antibiotics they say may prove more effective than current drugs. They say they have created a substance that quickly melts a germ's surface and in turn, prevents it from producing the next generation of bugs that might adapt to the drug. The discovery could prove to be a breakthrough, as scientists have warned of bacteria's increasing resistance to most antibiotics.

Israeli firm touts Dead Sea rescue plan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Dead Sea, the biblical site of Sodom and Gomorrah, is dying, evaporating at the rate of one billion cubic metres of water a year.

If current trends continue apace, the forecast is grim: the Dead Sea region, shared by Israel and Jordan, may wither into a dusty wasteland.

Plans to save the Dead Sea – the saltiest, lowest-lying body of water on the planet – have been discussed for decades, but have been stymied by a dearth of funds and political disputes.

If Shmuel Neumann, a Jerusalem businessman, has his way, the Dead Sea, known in Hebrew as Yam Hamelach, or the Salt Sea, will be revived, with all the attendant economic ramifications for tourism and agriculture.

Neumann is director of Global Village, an Israeli-U.S. company that hopes to reinvigorate it with the construction of a maze of tunnels from the Mediterranean Sea to the Dead Sea, starting in Ashkelon.

The project, which would cost anywhere from $5 billion to $20 billion (US), would use new tunnelling technology developed in Norway.

Until now, plans for restoring the Dead Sea, which is about 398 metres below sea level, turned on building a canal or series of canals from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea.

Desalination plants would purify the waters of the briny Red Sea before they flowed into the Dead Sea, while hydro-electric generators along the route would provide cheaper electricity, an idea envisaged by the founder of modern Zionism, Theodor Herzl, and elaborated on more lately by Shimon Peres, Israel's deputy prime minister.

The desalinated water would sustain new farming communities and tourist resorts, as well as replenish the Dead Sea, whose main tributary, the Jordan River, has been largely diverted to supply drinking water and feed the needs of agriculture and industry.

Global Village is proposing that the Red Sea model should be replaced by an alternative, consisting of tunnel waterways from the Mediterranean Sea to the Dead Sea, and its proposal is supported by the World Bank.

"Our system would be more expensive to build," Neumann said in an interview from Jerusalem. "But it would be more economical in the long run."

Neumann submitted his plan to the Israeli government for consideration two years ago and has discussed it with the ministry of infrastructure's chief scientist, but has yet to receive a definitive reply.

He believes his plan is better than the Red Sea model because it would be of greater benefit to Israel.

"The Red Sea-Dead Sea proposal would go through Jordan, and the benefits in terms of desalinated water would primarily benefit Jordan, although Israel and the Palestinian Authority are also supposed to share the water."

Under Global Village's proposal, Israel would receive a larger portion of desalinated water, making agriculture more feasible in the eastern and southern parts of the Negev Desert.

And significantly, the Global Village plan would raise the Dead Sea to its original levels, he said.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the Dead Sea's surface area was 950 square kilometres. By 1997, the surface area had shrunk to 640 square kilometres. In addition, the shoreline of the Dead Sea has receded by more than 30 metres in the past 50 years.

Neumann said that while the region has been extremely abused over the centuries, it can be reclaimed.

During the biblical era, the northern Negev was cultivated with orchards and the area between Arad and Sdeh Boker was famous for its array of wines. But under Ottoman rule, Palestine was environmentally devastated.

With sufficient water, the land can be resurrected, Neumann said. Without canals or tunnels to send fresh water into the region, the Dead Sea will shrivel, and the Negev will be irrigated only by desalinated water pumped from a great distance, he added.

During the 1980s, prior to signing a peace treaty with Jordan in 1994, Israel announced a scheme to rescue the Dead Sea with a plan to build a 200-kilometre-long canal from the Red Sea.

Jordan objected and filed a complaint against Israel at the United Nations. But Israel had also concluded that the project would be too costly.

Jordan no longer objects, but now the question is whether any of the schemes on the table will actually be cost effective and economically beneficial.

Son hopes to revive interest in father's art

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Oscar Cahén died just over 50 years ago. Never heard of him? You're not alone. But the Canadian artistic community still reveres him as one of the country's most brilliant abstract painters.

He was admired for his freelance illustrations, which he drew for Maclean's magazine, the Montreal Standard and the National Film Board, among others.

But his personal paintings are what drew the attention of art lovers everywhere.

Cahén was considered a visionary in abstract art circles, celebrated for his unique use of "far out" colours and forms.

And he was discovered by accident.

Born Feb. 8, 1916, in Copenhagen, Denmark, to a vehemently anti-Nazi activist family, Cahén studied throughout Europe, attending art and design schools in Germany, France, Italy, Sweden and Czechoslovakia, and earning a master's degree in fine arts.

In 1938, he took up a professorship at the Rotter School of Art in Prague, where he taught design, illustration and painting.

Shortly before the outbreak of World War II, his father, Fritz-Max, escaped to America. His mother, Mali, a broadcaster, was invited to England to work and Cahén went with her to avoid reprisals by the Nazis.

But because he held a German passport, the English, fearing he might become an insurgent should the Nazis defeat the allies, imprisoned Cahén as an enemy alien and in 1943 shipped him to a detention camp in Sherbrooke, Que.

While there, Cahén, who continued to draw and paint, was featured in a story by the Standard on the displaced persons in the Sherbrooke camp.

TEATRON PRESENTS LAST NIGHT OF BALLYHOO BY ALFRED UHRY

The Last Night of Ballyhoo, Alfred Uhry's award-winning play, which the Teatron Theatre Company is staging in Toronto, is a comedy that, like most comedies, contains hints of much darker material.

"The play's beauty is that while being a well-written comedy, it looks into some very challenging dilemmas in our lives and in the lives of Jewish people in a general society," said Teatron artistic director Ari Weisberg. "So the challenge is to keep the comedy a comedy while being true to the few moments which are a little bit more serious."

Ballyhoo is set in Atlanta in 1939, as the city celebrates the gala opening of the film Gone with the Wind. A darkness creeps into the story because of simultaneous events in Europe, where Hitler's Nazi storm troopers have just invaded Poland.

Two things of special note in this production.

First, the cast reunites Reva Lawry and Irving Dobbs, who play a brother and sister-in-law. They previously played a sister-in-law and brother 25 years ago in the Fairview Players production of The Prisoner of Second Avenue.

Second, Teatron has been invited to perform Ballyhoo as a fund-raiser for the Kingston Jewish community. It's the first time the seven-year-old Toronto-based company will send a production on the road.

Teatron's seven-person cast performs the play at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Jan. 24 to 28. For tickets, please call 416-781-5527.

Adlai Waxman in Concert: Singer-songwriter Adlai Waxman's piano-based music resonates with the influence of many genres – pop, jazz, rock, world, folk and roots.

He has been compared to Randy Newman, Joe Jackson and Steely Dan. At a recent concert, author Margaret Atwood asked him to turn up his microphone so she could hear his words.

According to publicist Brian Epstein, three of Waxman's songs have reached No. 1 on the CBC New Music Canada website. He performs at the Lula Lounge, 1585 Dundas St. W., on Wednesday, Jan. 17. Doors open 7 p.m., show starts 8:30.

Two Israeli Films: The Toronto Jewish Film Society opens its new season with two Israeli films – the family comedy Like a Fish Out of Water and A Green Chariot, a thoughtful and provocative tale about a Russian immigrant who leaves his secular life behind and chooses the Orthodox path in Israel. Miles Nadal JCC, Sunday, Jan. 21, 4 and 7:30 p.m. $15; MNjcc members $12.

TJFF Chai Tea: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents The First Time I Was Twenty as the next instalment in its Chai Tea series. The French film (subtitled) focuses on Hannah, a fat teenage girl who is not interested in dating and desperately wants to join a school jazz band that is traditionally all male.

"By remaining true to herself, Hannah finds the courage to score points for girls who do not spend their lives chasing boys, the cultural outsiders and for fat girls everywhere." $15. Sheppard Grande Cinema, Yonge and Sheppard. Sunday, Jan. 28. Chai tea 4 p.m., film screening 5 p.m. 416-324-9121. www.tjff.com

Concert unites classical, jazz and klezmer performers

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

For years now, classical music experts have been trying to figure out how to make the genre more appealing to pop-loving twentysomethings. One classical pianist may have found the answer.

"If classical music is presented in a familiar environment, it'll really resonate," says Andrew Burashko, a renowned Toronto-based pianist and founder of the Art of Time Ensemble, a collective whose purpose is to stimulate interest in classical music.

"The whole reason for Art of Time," says Burashko, "is to create a more modern context for classical music and to draw connections to the modern world."

Burashko pulls that off by creating programs that bring together artists from disparate genres who play songs based on a common theme. Art of Time's next show, on Jan. 18 and 19, will unite classical, jazz and klezmer performers in a celebration of Jewish music.

"Jewish music is incredibly infectious," says Burashko, who's Jewish himself. "Music is a huge part of Jewish life and religion. If you look at the classical virtuosi from the first half of the 20th century, all great performers of classical music were Jews from eastern Europe."

The show includes performances by jazz trumpeter David Buchbinder and vocalist and former Bourbon Tabernacle Choir member David Wall, among other Jewish performers. "The program is about putting a bunch of pieces I really love and I think are great into the same program," says Burashko. "The Jewish flavour is so strong and recognizable that no matter what style it's written in, it comes through."

Andrew Burashko

One of the artists performing at the show is pianist Marilyn Lerner. The Toronto-based musician has been playing Jewish-themed music for years, but working with Burashko and the other performers, she says, will be a real treat. "This is a very exciting project for me, working with Jewish music in a modern context," she says on the phone. "There's a wealth of beautiful music out there."

Lerner adds that getting music out to a younger generation is paramount if klezmer or classical is to survive. However, with the record industry losing money these days, getting new music to the masses is proving increasingly difficult. "The music industry in general is in trouble right now," she says. "Record companies are very loath to put music out. I think it's part of a general symptom of the whole culture."

Playing for young crowds at festivals and workshops is encouraging though, she says. "I am seeing young people. Definitely in academic circles there, young people are interested."

Outside of his Art of Time gigs, Burashko has trouble reaching youth, too. "The average age of an audience is probably at least sixty. They're dying and nobody's listening to classical music. And I don't blame them." He says that because performance practices date back at least 100 years, newer crowds can't relate to a classical music show. "The idea of going to a concert where everybody comes on stage wearing tuxedos and they're a mile away from you, there's something very foreign in that context."

With Art of Time, Burashko breaks down these barriers, creating a more intimate show that non-classical fans can enjoy. "Classical music isn't supposed to be more intellectual than other kinds of music," he says. "It's meant to connect with people on a visceral level. Anybody can be inspired by a piece of classical music. It doesn't have to be so foreign and dry."

To prove this further, in March, Burashko teams up with mainstream pop artists Hawksley Workman, Sara Slean, Andy Maize and Martin Tielli to present music related to Franz Schubert. "The backbone is still classical music," he says. "Diversifying like this makes our audience unique. We've got teens and seniors, but the average is people in their late 30s and early 40s."

As much as Burashko hopes to entice new audiences to listen to classical music, there's another reason he created Art of Time. "I would be lying if I said this was all for some kind of idealistic purpose. It's also about taking pleasure in artists whom I love, who I enjoy as a fan."

The editor took note of Cahén's talent and commissioned his work for the paper. Soon afterward, influential individuals in the publication industry, amazed by his talent and work ethic, convinced the detention camp commander to let Cahén out on the promise he would earn a living and be no threat to the nation.

He married Martha Levins, the daughter of a cantor, in Montreal, and they had one son, Michael.

Cahén soon moved to Toronto, where he received his Canadian citizenship in 1946.

His work was displayed in showings by the Ontario Society of Arts, and he helped found the exhibition group, Painters Eleven, a group of artists who introduced abstract art to the Toronto scene.

Cahén's reputation was growing in leaps and bounds, earning him comparisons with practitioners of the "New York style," which included noted American abstract painter Jackson Pollock, when tragedy struck.

Toys for Adults by Oscar Cahén. [© The Cahén Archives]

On Nov. 26, 1956, Cahén was killed in a car accident while driving in Oakville. He was just 40 years old.

He left behind a legacy of work that should be seen by anyone who loves art.

Though some of Cahén's work is on display at the National Gallery of Canada, the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Vancouver Art Gallery, late last year Michael decided to make part of his private collection available for public viewing.

> 'The feedback I am getting is that [Cahén's] work is as fresh as if it was done today'

Those works are now on display in concurrent exhibits: one in Montreal at the Galerie Samuel Lallouz, 1434 Sherbrooke St. W., and the other at Gallery Moos in Toronto, 622 Richmond St. W., until Jan. 27.

Michael, the keeper of his father's work these many years, had thought of re-establishing his father's patrimony for awhile before finally choosing the end of 2006 to begin the process.

"It's the right time," he said. "Great art is perpetually fresh. As a historian, there are periods you want to look back and examine… 25, 50, 100 years… you're far enough away that you can capture a fresh view. And the feedback I am getting is that [Cahén's] work is as fresh as if it was done today."

Michael hopes these limited exhibits will rekindle interest in his father's work and looks forward to hosting a major retrospective of Cahén's works sometime soon.

Bashar Assad's biographer partial to Syria

The New Lion of Damascus* by David W. Lesch, Yale University Press.

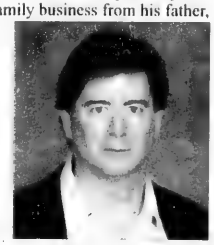
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Bashar Assad, the president of Syria for the past 6½ years, basically inherited the family business from his father, Hafiz, who ruled the country with an iron hand from 1970 onward.



David W. Lesch

Trained as an ophthalmologist, Assad wants to reform Syria's moribund economy and liberalize its repressive political system, but a succession of foreign crises have diverted him from seriously addressing these concerns.

Within months of him succeeding his father, the second Palestinian uprising broke out and then, less than a year later, Assad had to deal with the fallout from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States. After the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq, the Bush administration accused his regime of aiding and abetting anti-American insurgents.

When the Lebanese prime minister, Rafiq Hariri, was assassinated in 2005, Syria was forced to pull its troops out of Lebanon. As last summer's Israel/ Hezbollah war raged, Washington claimed that Syria had supplied that Lebanese militia with some of the rockets that rained down on Israeli towns and cities.

Syria, therefore, has been in the news since that day on July 17, 2000 when Assad was sworn in as president.

But what lies behind the blare of the headlines? David W. Lesch, a professor of Middle East history at Trinity University in Texas, examines these issues in The New Lion of Damascus, the first biography of Assad in English.

Lesch, a former professional baseball player who was the Los Angeles Dodgers' number 1 draft pick in 1980, spent three weeks in Syria in 2004 gathering material for this book, during which time he interviewed Assad.

He claims that he is not an "apologist" for Syria, and that is mainly true. On the whole, this is an informative book, though Lesch is partial toward Syria. "I would like him [Assad] to succeed," he writes. In another passage, he refers to Israel's "infamous pre-emptive strike" that launched the Six Day War.

Be that as it may, The New Lion of Damascus is a well-researched and mostly balanced work that will be of value to students of Syrian affairs.

Lesch describes Assad ("lion" in Arabic) as a principled, unassuming, honest, sincere and polite man who has not displayed the "thuggish behaviour that is so commonplace in the region and was associated with his father." Indeed, he claims that Assad – a member of the Shiite Alawite minority – has always been and continues to be "uncomfortable with his inherited family legacy and his position."

Assad's assertion should be taken with a grain of salt. Lesch acknowledges that he was carefully groomed for leadership after his older, flamboyant brother, Basil, was killed in an automobile accident in 1994.

Bashar Assad

Although he pursued his studies in ophthalmology in Britain after Basil's sudden demise, he was constantly being readied for the presidency. Assad claims that he never expected to be handed that job, but Lesch is skeptical.

Assad, however, hoped to play an important role in Syria once his father was gone. Syria's power brokers catapulted him to the top not only out of loyalty to his late father, but because they would have abhorred a dramatic change in the status quo and wished to preserve Alawite control, not to mention their perks and privileges. Portrayed as a devoted family man who changed diapers as a doting new father, Assad officially took office after the rubber-stamp parliament agreed to his nomination and a Soviet-style nation-wide referendum gave him a 97 per cent approval rating.

Lesch says that Assad's broad aim is to modernize Syria, which is rife with corruption, nepotism and incompetence. And while he swung a big broom shortly after becoming president, forcing the retirement and removal of a number of senior Baath party officials, Assad has limited powers. As Lesch puts it, "He has yet to establish the legitimacy that his father painstakingly built up." Nor does Assad possess his father's political base.

Due, perhaps, to these factors, Assad is wary of bringing democracy to Syria. Early in his reign, he released political prisoners, shook up the state media and tolerated a modicum of dissent. But Assad has made it crystal-clear that Jeffersonian-style democracy has no place in Syria today. "We cannot apply democracy of others unto ourselves," he said in a speech. In the meantime, Syria's human rights record remains abysmal, as Lesch reminds us.

As might be expected, Israel figures quite prominently in The New Lion of Damascus. According to Lesch, Assad concurs with his father's position that peace is a Syrian interest. Lesch agrees: "Syria will probably never reach its economic potential until peace with Israel is consummated."

Though Assad wants to return to the negotiating table with Israel without conditions, he insists on the full recovery of the Golan Heights, or an Israeli withdrawal to the June 4, 1967, lines. Lesch says that the Golan is "a personal matter" for Assad, given the fact that his father was defence minister when Syria lost that 1,250-kilometre chunk of land during the Six Day War.

Lesch doubts whether Assad personally ordered the assassination of Hariri. "He probably did not know anything about it," he writes, saying that Syria's multi-layered intelligence agencies are beyond Assad's reach.

In this connection, he believes that Syria will continue to destabilize Lebanon to prove the point that the Lebanese cannot achieve stability without a Syrian military presence.

As for Syria's support of Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Lesch trots out the old argument that Damascus regards them as legitimate "resistance" organizations and correspondingly views Israeli actions in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip as state terrorism.

Lesch says that Assad has cultivated Syria's relations with Tehran on the grounds that Iran provides Syria with "strategic depth." There is some truth to this. Iran's president, a certified Holocaust denier who consorts with neo-Nazis, recently declared that Iran would come to Syria's aid in the event of an Israeli attack.

Lesch devotes a portion of his book to Syria's tense relationship with the United States. Assad has more than once assured Washington that Syria is not aiding insurgents in Iraq, but the Bush administration doubts his sincerity. Under U.S. pressure, Assad claims to have shut down the offices of Hamas and Islamic Jihad in Damascus, but these groups are still free to operate in Syria.

Lesch says that Assad is frustrated by U.S. hostility to Syria, given Syria's participation in the 1991 Gulf War and its co-operation in fighting Al Qaeda after the events of Sept. 11.

In closing, Lesch observes that Assad will fall short of reforming Syria unless he finally "escapes from the shadow of his father" and gets rid of entrenched elements in the government "who only see their future in the legacy of the past."

It is a fair assessment. It remains to be seen whether Assad has the ability, never mind the will or the means, to cross the Rubicon and make sweeping changes to "a worn-down dictatorship."

Transsexuals face barriers in the Orthodox world

By MEIRA MAIEROVITZ DRAZIN
JTA

Mordechai, a 31-year-old Orthodox lawyer from Toronto, gave his wife a Jewish divorce this past summer.

Then he began his life as Nicole, a woman.

Nicole isn't the first transgender person to live an Orthodox life, but as far as anyone knows, she is the first Orthodox person to transition publicly and "in place."

Transsexuals may always face obstacles and taboos in mainstream western societies, but Orthodox Jews who make the transition face even greater complications.

"I'm not challenging halachic Judaism and I don't want it to be perceived that way," Nicole said, referring to Jewish law. "It would be easier for me in some ways to reject Judaism and the Orthodox community, but it's what I believe and value, and [transitioning] isn't a rejection of any of those things but an affirmation of them."

"Ninety-nine percent of Orthodox Jews who transition do not stay frum," or religiously observant, said Beth Orens, the pseudonym of one Orthodox transwoman from the Midwest who is the most visible and prolific Internet presence on issues of Judaism and transsexuality. "It takes a certain amount of stubbornness to do so.

"I've corresponded with a couple of yeshiva guys who were thinking about it," she continued. "About two years, ago a guy on the Dina list" – an e-mail list Orens established to create a meeting place for Orthodox transsexuals – "killed himself. He couldn't deal with the repercussions of transitioning."

Orens and Nicole also recently started dinablog.wordpress.com, a Web log for "Orthodox-by-background transpeople and their families."

The Dina list, which includes Jews from the United States, Israel, Canada and the United Kingdom, has fewer than a dozen members. It's difficult to determine what percentage of the population, Jewish or otherwise, transsexuals represent: statistics Canada and the U.S. Census Bureau don't count transsexuals, and many people who make the transition don't want to be counted.

The data most often cited by the American Psychiatric Association, based on a decade-old European study, suggest that roughly one in 30,000 adult males and one in 100,000 adult females seek sex-reassignment surgery.

But most gender advocates say the numbers are much higher, with one study claiming that based on calculations of the surgery performed in the United States, at least one in 2,500 adult males in the United States has become a woman.

Orens, who is 43, was 32 when she transitioned and 33 when she had the surgery.

She was married for eight years before her transition, and her ex-wife has barred Orens from seeing their two children. Though she moved to New York from Israel to transition, she moved back to Israel after her surgery.

Five years ago, however, after being "outed" on a bus by a former close friend, she returned to the United States with her new partner and their six-year-old daughter.

Orens and her partner live in a suburb 10 minutes from where she grew up. At the modern Orthodox synagogue they attend, she sees the parents of an elementary school friend, someone she knew from high school and even her college roommate.

"It's like I'm a ghost," she said. "Nobody knows who I am."

Dr. Dana Beyer, a retired surgeon in Chevy Chase, Md., said "Nicole is the first Orthodox woman that I know of to transition in place publicly."

Beyer, 54, a transwoman who, like Nicole, attended an Orthodox yeshiva for boys as a child, is now Conservative and recently ran for public office. She is an activist and advocate on civil rights and medical issues.

"From when I was seven years old, I knew I was a girl," Beyer said. "Standing there with the boys, saying 'she'lo asani isha' every morning," the prayer where men thank God for not making them female, "it was like swallowing crushed glass."

It took Beyer another four decades to become a woman. Along the way she had two children with her first wife. When she began to transition in 2000, she and her second wife divorced.

In 2003, Beyer had surgery on her face and genitals. Now she describes herself as a single Jewish woman and attends a progressive, egalitarian Conservative synagogue.

"Only Reform and Reconstructionism say that [transsexuals] are specifically welcome, and I'm not Reform," Beyer said. "But I went to my Conservative rabbi and made a case, and he said OK."

In 2003, the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College admitted Reuben Zellman, who became the first openly transgender person accepted into a Jewish rabbinical school.

In December 2003, the Conservative movement officially recognized that those who have undergone full sex-reassignment surgery "are to be considered as having changed their sex status, and so recognized by Jewish law."

Their decision relies on the responsum of the Orthodox halachic authority Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg, known as the "Tzitz Eliezer," in which he states that sex status is determined by the external genitalia, even if surgically constructed.

The Orthodox community does not accept this as the majority opinion, however, and it is unlikely that Nicole will have as easy a time in an Orthodox synagogue.

A rebbe with whom she is still close told Nicole that although transitioning is not permitted halachically, there probably is still more room for it in Jewish law than in Jewish society.

Rabbi J. David Bleich, an authority on Jewish law, ethics and bioethics who has written about transsexuals from an Orthodox perspective, agreed.

Transitioning "is an impossible situation," Rabbi Bleich said. "Shul is the least of such a person's problems. If such a person is looking for acceptance, it's not in the cards. He should be happy if people don't criticize him to his face."

"Maybe transitioning was wrong, was 'asur,'" or forbidden by Jewish law, said Orens, who like many Orthodox women does not shake hands with men and wears sleeves cut below her elbows. "We believe that this life is not all there is, there is 'olam haba,'" or afterlife. "Maybe I shouldn't have transitioned, lived as a boy as I could, and died miserable.

"But it's natural for people to want to save themselves," she said. "If I made a mistake, I'll find out when I stand before the 'kiseh hakavod,'" or God's throne, to be judged, she said.

"Or maybe [God] will say, 'I'm so proud.' I did what I had to do and so did Nicole," she continued. "It's not a question of whether it's acceptable, but that we had to do it."

Meeting debates Federation control of Nadal JCC

But not all attendees at the meeting were anti-federation. "We have a partnership, thank God, with the federation, because the place wouldn't be here without them," said one.

Instead of creating an "adversarial relationship," he recommended working together "as best as you can."

A December "memorandum of understanding" between the federation and the 3,300-member centre, which was distributed at the meeting, outlined responsibilities of both the federation and the JCC, which operates the centre.

Harold Wolkin, incoming JCC president, said the document was intended to "align the interests of the larger Jewish community with the community here at the Miles Nadal."

> 'We're charged with ongoing responsibilty of keeping this a vibrant organization'

The centre, which serves a mixed constituency of Jews and non-Jews, is responsible for decisions on issues such as hours of operation, services offered, and types of membership, Wolkin said. "I would say we're really charged with the ongoing responsibility of keeping this a vibrant organization."

Federation responsibilities include employing the JCC's executive director, consulting with the centre on its budget, and consulting and assisting with fundraising and legal issues.

Referring in part to the centre's hours on Shabbat and holidays, as well as to its lack of a kosher restaurant, Friedland noted that Jewish observance policies that are appropriate for the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre in North York don't "work" downtown because of the mixed community.

Pitcher, fielder turning pro in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you're 21 or 22 years old and you get the offer to play pro baseball, you gotta take it.

It doesn't matter if it's not for the New York Yankees or the Boston Red Sox, let alone the Lansing Lugnuts, Memphis Redbirds or the Tennessee Smokies.

If your dream is to play pro ball and the offer comes from the yet-to-play-a-game Israel Baseball League (IBL), you go. At least that's the philosophy of two young Jewish ballplayers from Toronto, who recently inked contracts to play baseball in the Holy Land.

Ian Okorofsky and Daniel Drori will head for Israel sometime in May to gear up for the IBL's inaugural season, which commences on June 24. The IBL's compact season, which will see each team play 45 games, ends on Aug. 19 with the championship game.

Okorofsky, 21, and Drori, soon to be 22, have been buddies since kindergarten, and they've played occasionally on the same baseball team. Okorofsky, a left-handed pitcher, and Drori, an outfielder and power hitter, were asked to play in Israel after attending an evaluation camp in Miami recently. They were among 65 hopefuls invited to the one-day camp who impressed the league's director of player development, Dan Duquette. That's the same Dan Duquette who was once general manager of the Boston Red Sox and Montreal Expos.

Proving he can rise to the occasion, Okorofsky threw harder than he has before. His fast ball was clocked at 84 to 85 m/ph in Miami. Usually he throws in the 70s.

Drori got noticed when at his one at-bat in a mini-scrimmage, facing a professional pitcher from the Dominican Republic recruited out of the Milwaukee Brewers' organization, he promptly singled right down the middle. Then, as the pitcher sized up the next batter, Drori stole second base and, for an encore, took third as well.

Okorofsky, who played for Oshawa Dodgers (Intercounty Baseball League) last year after recording a 10-2 record and a 2.77 ERA with the Ontario Maple Leafs, describes himself as a "crafty left-hander… I'm not really a fast-ball guy. I'm more of a location guy." His best pitches are the change-up and curve ball.

Drori, who has played for the York University Lions for the past three years, considers himself "definitely a power hitter. My whole life I wanted to play professional baseball. That's every kid's dream."

Drori has played for the Ontario Blue Jays, a college prospect team, and the Canadian Thunderbirds. In 2002, both he and Okorofsky were selected to the Canadian Maccabiah baseball team. That was one year into the intifadah and with bombs going off across Israel, the Games were nearly cancelled. When the decision to play was taken, baseball was one of the sports that was was dropped.

As a consolation, both were recruited to the Toronto team that competed in the JCC Maccabi Youth Games in Philadelphia that summer. They finished fourth.

Drori was disappointed when the baseball team was dropped from the Maccabiah Games. When the athletes' attitudes were canvassed, "I was one of the guys who wanted to go," he said. "The rest of the team didn't."

For Drori, that trip would have meant something of a homecoming. Born in Jerusalem, he has lived in Canada since age four, but he still has dozens of relatives in the Holy Land. He gained some media attention about a year ago when his attempt to get Canadian authorities to record his place of birth in his passport as "Jerusalem, Israel" was turned down. His new passport gives his place of birth as simply "Israel."

Drori expects to have lots of family members attend his games this summer, but he doesn't know where he'll be playing. Players recruited to the league will be assigned to one of the circuit's six teams – Bet Shemesh Blue Sox, Modi'in Miracle, Haifa/Nahariya Stingrays, Netanya Tigers, Tel Aviv Lightning and Petach Tikvah Pioneers. If the league lasts, perhaps one day they'll be known as the Original Six.

Although Drori is ready to play anywhere, he'd prefer suiting up for Tel Aviv. Wherever he's assigned, he's hoping he shows enough to make the team Israel is proposing to send to the 2009 World Baseball Classic.

Slugger Dan Drori, left, and pitcher Ian Okorofsky will play in the Israel Baseball League this summer.

As a Hebrew-speaking player in the league – which is recruiting lots of non-Jewish players as well – he's in an ideal position to act as a goodwill ambassador for the sport, something which is expected of all the players.

Growing the sport in Israel excites Okorofsky as well. Another consideration in prompting him to play in Israel is the prospect of being noticed by Duquette. With Duquette's Major League contacts, you never know where you might end up, he said.

Plus, there's the excitement of being a professional athlete – though not a particularly well paid one.

The ballplayers will receive free transportation to and from Israel, accommodations and meals, plus a small amount of cash.

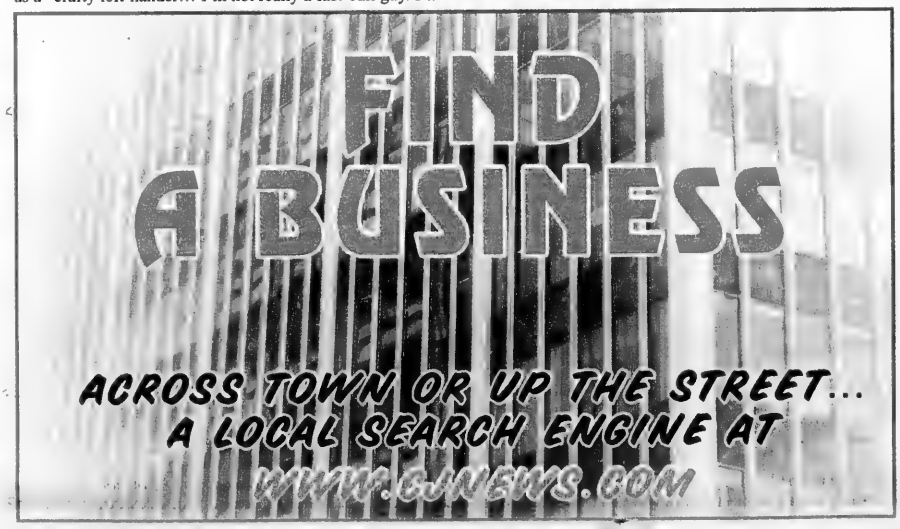
Okorofsky thinks the baseball should be pretty entertaining. He was impressed with the calibre of players invited to Miami, many of whom were NCAA Division II calibre, with some Division I and community college players as well.

Seventy of the Israeli league's 120 players have been selected, with tryout camps scheduled for California and Arizona to round out the rosters.

The league is the brainchild of Boston businessman Larry Baras, who enlisted Duquette to run the baseball operation, and Dan Kurtzer, former U.S. ambassador to Israel and Egypt, to serve as commissioner of the league. Marshall Glickman, former president of the NBA Portland Trailblazers, is also associated with the league as is Marvin Goldklang, minority owner of the Yankees.

The IBL's mission statement (www.israelbaseballleague.com) is "to provide Israeli communities the opportunity to experience the wonder and excitement of the world's greatest game."

In addition to promoting the sport in Israel, the league plans to support efforts of the Israel Association of Baseball and the Israel Softball Association to develop players, build new baseball diamonds, provide baseball equipment to Israeli players and raise funds to support the sport's development in the Holy Land.



When the parent rejects help

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

Within one day, I had the same conversation with three daughters – one from one family and two from another: part of my message was, "Sometimes you can't plan because the person you are planning for doesn't want any part of it."

The first time was in a phone call from the wife of a colleague. She was told by a health-care professional attending to her mother – who was slightly cognitively impaired but still managing in the community with help – that there is really no planning the daughter can undertake because her mother is adamant about not leaving her home.

The daughter said, "There must be something I can do right now, even if my mother absolutely refuses anything I offer her. She understands up to a point but is so stubborn that I just can't move forward. I am very frustrated – I feel I should do something, to plan but do not know exactly for what."

In the second situation, two daughters visited my office with their father, who had many medical complaints, all of which could be helped with some beneficial intervention. However, as the possibilities were being discussed, including the issue of some depressive symptoms, one of the daughters said, "It's because of the situation at home. My mother is so stubborn and makes things very hard for my father. She refuses any help in the house and still expects him, at 92 and not as strong as he used to be, to take care of everything."

The daughters acknowledged that because their mother refused outside help, they were doing many regular tasks with their parents, including bill paying and household upkeep, in rotation with another sister and brother who shared in chores.

"It works, but it is exhausting and we see the frustration on my father's face every time we try to provide some sort of help and she rejects it. Her memory is poor, so sometimes the same issues come up repeatedly. She refuses to see doctors, so we cannot even find out if some medication might help, and she not only fails to take her pills but keeps telling my father he should stop taking his as well."

Such stories are not unusual, and for caring children, it can be an awful dilemma – trying to figure out what to do while respecting their parent's wishes, even if they seem irrational. The problem is that even if one could legally remove the decision-making capacity from the parent as a result of mental incapacity, very few children are willing to "force" the parent into doing something he or she vehemently opposes.

Yet, even though many elderly individuals refuse to move to a long-term care facility, many do get moved against what appears to be their wishes and accommodate rather well and quickly, despite their initial opposition.

However, sometimes the children must accept that they cannot force the situation but should keep trying whatever they can think of to cajole, induce or convince their parent to try something different. At times, the children just have to wait things out until literally "something" happens that causes a crisis that requires intervention. From there, they can move things forward. The important thing is to recognize that one cannot feel guilty about the way it all worked out.

As for the daughter who "wants to do something," I suggested she could explore long-term care facilities so that if and when the time comes, she knows what is available and what might be the best move, without having to explore this option under duress. It is most important to remember that one can only do what can be done and it is the caring that matters, even when the doing doesn't go exactly as one might want.

A relief to the world

Seymour Epstein

I had occasion recently to re-study the Mishnah tractate Sanhedrin as part of a reading of the full six books of the Mishnah in memory of a Jew who died. Actually, re-studying Mishnah is a redundant term, since the word "Mishnah" itself comes from a root that speaks of repetition or constant re-studying.

We Jews have a habit of re-reading the same text many times, but each reading has the potential for new meanings. There is a section of Sanhedrin in Chapter 4, Mishnah 5 that deals with the need to warn witnesses in capital cases of their great responsibility. As the Mishnah states, capital cases are different from monetary ones in that "[the accused's] blood and the blood of his offspring… [are involved] until the end of the world."

At the end of that famous section, a question is posed that has relevance in these days after the hanging of Saddam Hussein. After all the warnings, the witnesses might decide that the responsibility is too great and that they need not bother. They are reminded of the biblical verse that demands that a witness testify if he has seen wrongdoing or suffer the punishment of the criminal (Leviticus 5:1). If the witnesses further protest that they do not want to be responsible for spilling human blood, the Mishnah quotes Proverbs 11:10, "And when the wicked perish, there is joy."

One would hope that our students, young and old, who study and re-study our values-laden texts will be able to apply this teaching to the horrific hanging witnessed by many on their computer screens. Saddam had more blood on his hands than any other resident of the 21st century, and notwithstanding the Shia taunts and the undisciplined behaviour in his last moments, his death, according to our learned tradition, is a relief to the world of justice and even a cause for joy.

The Jew we honoured by learning Mishnayot led a pure life of service to mankind and devotion to God. The man we killed represented more evil than we can imagine, the antithesis of God's will.

Agoraphobia, fears and victory

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

In the last issue of the CJN, I wrote about my trip to Argentina and what an eye-opener it was, having been exposed to a culture and way of life that's dramatically different from our own. I learned much about that Jewish community's precious traditions and troubling challenges. I also discovered a great deal about myself – including my victory over agoraphobia.

Since 1994, I have suffered from agoraphobia, the fear of open or public places. Agoraphobia literally means "a fear of the market place" and manifests itself through anxiety and panic when a person is out of their safe zone. People with extreme agoraphobia never leave their homes.

Through extensive therapy, I began to realize that as a child, I suffered from severe separation anxiety and preferred to stay in familiar environments where I felt protected and out of harm's way. As I grew, so did my separation anxiety. It ultimately evolved into agoraphobia.

The good news: my coach says I am no longer agoraphobic, and while I may experience high levels of anxiety and occasional panic attacks, the fact is that I took a 10-hour flight to Buenos Aries and stayed a week in a Latin American country far from home – a triumph I consider to be one of the greatest of my life.

I now feel free, or at least freer, and fantasize about trips to Israel (I haven't visited since 1994) and Africa – and especially to Ve'ahavta's places of operation. My ability to do so means the motivation that I previously relied on to do my work (which came from reports, pictures and, of course, from within) will now come from my physical presence in our areas of work and the chance to see our accomplishments first-hand.

Being agoraphobic all those years was painful. There's a certain irony in the fact that the founding director of a humanitarian organization that has sent teams to Honduras, El Salvador, Guyana, Cuba, Zimbabwe, Turkey, Sri Lanka and Israel over a 10-year period was unable to be part of them. I frequently compared myself to a pianist who is no longer able to use his or her hands.

I was always the person who would see our teams off, wishing them well and extending words of support and encouragement. Once the teams had departed, I would gather up the paperwork and leftover boxes (we are always forced to repack at the airport), then sadly walk through the terminal exit and into the parking lot. Driving away from the airport, I would look at my watch and imagined our volunteers buckled into their seats, contemplating the incredible opportunity to enhance the lives of people in such places as the rainforests of Guyana or the villages of Sri Lanka.

But I'm no longer agoraphobic. What a celebration! Through my years of struggle, I've discovered a strength that allows me to feel safe from within. I know I'll always suffer from excessive anxiety, but at least Mississauga is no longer too far to travel to.

If you have a phobia, get help. I did, and I owe a great deal to my coach. Many people who suffer from agoraphobia or other phobias function well in society on a day-to-day basis. Generally, it's because we've become intimate friends with our fears and have figured out ways to work around them. We evolve into masters at manipulating our own weaknesses, hiding them and ensuring that others don't see too much of that side of us – a side that scares us, and them.

But life is short, and it would have been a shame if I never got the chance to sit in a café in Buenos Aries, sipping coffee as I watched people stroll past. It gave me a glimpse into another world on our vast planet.

Canada considers more Palestinian aid

CIDA may donate $12M to $15M in humanitarian assistance

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian International Development Agency, an arm of the federal government, is on the verge of donating $12 million to $15 million in humanitarian assistance to the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Given the very difficult circumstances faced by the Palestinians, we're considering providing support," said CIDA spokesperson Greg Scott in an interview from Ottawa last week.

The news coincided with two related events: Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay's trip to Israel, the Palestinian areas and Jordan, and Israel's announcement that it will release about $100 million (US) in withheld Palestinian tax and customs revenues.

The proposed Canadian funds will be channelled through the Temporary International Mechanism – which is administered by the European Union and the World Bank – and will not reach the Palestinian Authority's new Hamas government.

Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay visited the Hall of Names in the Holocaust History Museum at Yad Vashem on Sunday. [Israel Sun photo]

The Temporary International Mechanism was established last summer to ensure that international aid does not fall into the hands of Hamas, which defeated Fatah in last January's legislative election in the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Hamas, which Canada and other western nations have branded as a terrorist group, formed a government in March, though Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas remains president of the PA.

After Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh was sworn in, Canada became the first donor nation to cut off funding to the Palestinian government, boycott it and subject it to international economic sanctions.

Since then, the 3.5 million Palestinian inhabitants in the West Bank and Gaza have faced increasing hardship.

The aid will not be restored unless Hamas – which has taken credit for a succession of suicide bombings

Peretz backs Ashkenazi for IDF chief

By AMOS HAREL
AND GIDEON ALON
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz will recommend to the cabinet that it approve Maj.-Gen. (res.) Gabi Ashkenazi as Israel's 19th chief of staff. Ashkenazi is currently director general of the Defence Ministry.

Peretz arrived at the decision after a series of consultations he held Sunday, and barring a last-minute change, he is expected to finalize the decision with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert this week. The appointment is expected to be finalized in two weeks.

The news came after Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz published a resignation letter last week in which he told Olmert and Peretz that he was acting out of a "sense of responsibility" over last year's Lebanon war. Olmert and Peretz both voiced regret at the resignation.

Halutz made history by becoming the first chief of Israel's armed forces to resign of his own free will. The move was widely expected, yet it was described in Israel and abroad as an earthquake for a country still reeling from the 34-day war with Hezbollah in July and August.

The aftershocks could eventually topple Olmert and Peretz.

The inconclusive 34-day offensive against Lebanon's Hezbollah militia left many Israelis feeling that their national security was undermined and demanding a purge of the top military brass.

The News in Brief

Canada

NDPers Visit Israel

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia NDP leader Darrell Dexter and NDP MLA Dave Wilson were in Israel Jan. 13 to 21 on a trip sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee for NDP activists from across Canada. It focused on minority rights, education, women's rights, labour issues and the environment, the Halifax Chronicle Herald reported.

TV Pioneer Dead at 91

TORONTO — Percy Saltzman, Canada's first TV weatherman and the first person to appear on Canada's first TV broadcast in 1952, died in Toronto Jan. 15 at 91 after a fall that led to declining health. The Winnipeg native, who worked for CBC, Global, CityTV and CTV during his 30-year career, was known for doing his broadcasts without notes or a teleprompter, and for his energetic delivery and chalk-toss at the end of each weather report.

World

Ig-Nobel Sentiments?

NEW YORK — Nobel Prize-winning scientist James Watson says anti-Semitism is sometimes justified. In an interview in Esquire magazine this month, Watson, a self-described libertarian, defended his right to make anti-Semitic remarks and wondered why everyone isn't as intelligent as Ashkenazi Jews. He said anti-Semitic remarks should be allowed "because some anti-Semitism is justified. Just like some anti-Irish feeling is justified. If you can't be criticized, that's very dangerous." Watson won the Nobel Prize in 1962 for his work on the structure of DNA. He has generated controversy for his views on eugenics, including a call to eliminate stupidity and ugly girls.

Vienna Bars Rabbi

VIENNA — A rabbi who took part in last month's Holocaust denial conference in Tehran has been excommunicated by Vienna's Jewish community and barred from entering kosher shops and receiving any community services. In a vote earlier this month, the community also denied Moshe Aryeh Friedman's status as a rabbi. While in Tehran, Friedman, a Vienna resident and member of the fringe anti-Zionist group Neturei Karta, was seen embracing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly questioned the Holocaust and threatened to destroy Israel.

Sax Innovator Dies

NEW YORK — Tenor saxophonist Michael Brecker died Jan. 13 in New York at 57 after a long battle with leukemia. A stylistic and harmonic innovator, Brecker won 11 Grammy Awards. He played on hundreds of pop and jazz recordings for artists such as Paul Simon, Herbie Hancock, Chick Corea, James Brown, Bruce Springsteen, Frank Sinatra, Charles Mingus and Aretha Franklin. A campaign to help Brecker find a bone-marrow donor produced thousands of new volunteer donors and included drives at a number of jazz festivals. He finished his last album just weeks ago.

Teens Found Guilty

LONDON — Two teenage girls from the Edgware neighbourhood of London have been found guilty of robbing a Jewish girl. The victim, 13, was on the bus home from school last year when she was attacked by the 14-year-olds, who asked if she was Jewish. When she answered, "I'm English," they pushed her to the floor, stomped on her face, kicked her and stole her bracelet. The attack left her unconscious with a fractured eye socket. The victim's family welcomed the verdict, but some in the Jewish community were concerned the prosecution didn't involve charges of anti-Semitism. Sentencing is next month.

Jerry Must Pay

NEW YORK — Jerry Seinfeld was ordered to pay fees to his realtor that he had tried to withhold because she was not available to show a property on Shabbat. The comedian tried to call realtor Tamara Cohen in 2005 about a Manhattan townhouse that she had shown his wife, but Cohen's phone was turned off for Shabbat. Seinfeld and his wife saw the property without the agent and negotiated a $3.95-million (US) sale with the owner. Seinfeld argued Cohen wasn't entitled to her fee since she wasn't available to show the place when he wanted to see it. But a judge ruled Cohen is entitled to a fee of nearly $100,000.

Scribe Mined Humour

WASHINGTON — Art Buchwald, who for years wrote a humour column in Paris and then in Washington, died of kidney failure Jan. 17 in Washington. He was 81. Buchwald found humour in such things as political corruption and differences between Europe and the United States in a column first published in the International Herald Tribune and then in the Washington Post.

Group Condemns Attack on Muslim School

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada has condemned the recent vandalism of École Jeunes Musulmans Canadiens in Montreal's St. Laurent neighbourhood.

More than a dozen of the school's windows were shattered by vandals early in the morning of Jan. 16. A school bus parked outside the school was also damaged.

"The vandalism of the school is unacceptable and deserves the condemnation of all Quebecers," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. "The Jewish community, which has a long history of being targeted by acts of vandalism, understands only too well the devastating impact of these types of incidents."

B'nai Brith said it has contacted the school's principal, Layla Sawaf, to express its hope for a full police investigation and the arrest of the perpetrator or perpetrators.

Secondary school teachers reject anti-Israel motion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto secondary school teachers last week rejected a motion that would have injected their union into the controversial world of Middle East politics by supporting an international boycott of Israel.

A second motion, which condemned violence and called for peace negotiations toward a two state solution, was also defeated by a bargaining unit of the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation (OSSTF).

The votes against the motions were overwhelming, said Arron Eisen, a math teacher at A.Y. Jackson Secondary School. "We used our voices and we spoke up for what was right."

Eisen, who voted against the motions, said the council meeting of the secondary teachers bargaining unit (STBU) was packed with teachers concerned about the proposed anti-Israel motion.

"The mood in the room was that they did not want any of these resolutions on the Middle East. They wanted it to stop."

Reinforcing teachers' opposition was a statement by OSSTF President Rhonda Kimberley Young, who told the meeting that concern had been raised "by many districts within Ontario who were extremely upset at the District 12 [Toronto region] motion," Eisen recounted.

"She was very concerned that if we continued on this road, that all the good work of the union would be overshadowed by the divisiveness of the Middle East."

Prior to the meeting, Israeli ambassador Alan Baker issued a news release expressing "his utter surprise and shock at the forthcoming motion.

'We used our voices and we spoke up for what was right'

"Not only is this a gratuitous attempt at politicizing the Ontario education system, but it is another avenue to disseminate misinformation and disinformation regarding the present situation that faces the Middle East," he stated.

Recognizing the divisiveness of the resolution, District 12 President Doug Jolliffe said he wanted the union to refrain from taking a position on the Middle East. However, Jolliffe told The CJN in December, after two other motions on the Middle East were withdrawn from the council agenda, that the union executive doesn't have the power to prevent teachers from introducing motions as they see fit.

Eisen, who has been following the controversy for months, said that, as a supporter of Israel, he opposed the union taking a one-sided position critical of the Jewish state.

Such a step might alienate union members who might reconsider whether to continue to support the union, he said.

Prior to the December STBU council meeting, Eisen co-authored a resolution that would have neutralized the motion attacking Israel. While both motions were withdrawn, he fully expected the issue would be revisited at the January meeting.

To prepare for that confrontation, he and about 40 like-minded teachers from a number of schools devised a strategy.

"We took it upon ourselves to speak to as many of our colleagues as possible," Eisen said, taking the position that, "while people have the right to their opinions, this resolution was unbalanced and one-sided, divisive and had the potential to create great internal friction within the union."

David Orenstein, a teacher at Danforth Collegiate and Technical Institute, said his concerns about Israel-bashing go back to criticism of Israel levelled in the D12 Voice, the newsletter of Toronto teachers. Later, a representative of the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) was invited to address a meeting of the union's human rights council about the public service union's resolution that called for a boycott of Israel.

In this space last week, I wrote about the most recent annual assessment of the state of the Jewish people published by the Jerusalem-based think tank, the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI). Specifically, I reproduced, in highly abbreviated form, the 10 key strategic agenda items that in the words of the JPPPI "require urgent consideration by Jewish organizations an leaders" around the world.

This week, I reproduce the thumbnail sketch of Jewish demographics and behaviours that the JPPPI also includes in its annual assessment. The accompanying chart appears in the executive summary of the full report. Expanded explanations of the information in the chart are available in the full report (JPPPI Annual Assessment 2006 – Major Shifts and Opportunities).

Of quick note, I point out that the JPPPI projects, as it did last year, a worldwide Jewish population of 13,558,000 in 2020. That figure represents an increase of less than 500,000 from the 13,058,000 that the JPPPI estimates to be the world Jewish population today.

In 1939, I note with profound sadness, there were approximately 18 million Jews.

Synagogues warm up winter for the homeless

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Can you imagine what it must have been like to sleep outside during last week's freezing rain and cold?

For thousands, it's a yearly reality.

Toronto's homeless and impoverished have a hard time in the best of circumstances, and these hardships become even tougher in the winter.

According to the most recent statistics on homelessness, the 2003 Toronto Housing and Homelessness Report Card, 31,985 homeless people (including 4,779 children) stayed in a Toronto shelter at least once during 2002.

That's why the Out of the Cold program – a multifaith initiative by churches and synagogues to provide shelter, food and companionship to people in desperate need of it – is crucial during the city's cold winter months.

Now in its 20th year, Out of the Cold continues to be part of key tikkun olam efforts at many shuls across Toronto.

Participating congregations open their doors or supply aid each day of the week on a rotating basis to house and feed the poor, ensuring that at least one place of refuge is available to them on every wintery night.

The program runs from November to April.

Micky Fraterman has spent nine years working with Out of the Cold's steering committee as the representative for the First Narayever Congregation.

She's also a hands-on volunteer.

"It's a very deep, personal and profound experience," she said. "I felt I could play a more active role in this effort, to relieve the immediate need of those around me."

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich [Beth Sholom photo]

The egalitarian shul provides volunteers who help feed more than 140 guests at nearby Trinity St. Paul's United Church on Bloor Street, since the Narayever's Brunswick Avenue site is too small to host the program.

"It's a true multifaith coalition," Fraterman said.

Other participating shuls include Darchei Noam (Reconstructionist), Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda (Conservative), Beth Sholom (Conservative), Holy Blossom Temple (Reform), Beit Rayim (Conservative) and Temple Har Zion (Reform).

It all amounts to some serious chesed.

Holy Blossom, on Bathurst Street just south of Eglinton Avenue, is Toronto's oldest Jewish congregation. It serves meals and entertains more than 100 guests every Thursday evening, and provides overnight sanctuary to 45 people.

On Mondays, Beit Emeth, in Bathurst Manor, provides warm meals, a TTC ticket, music and overnight accommodation to 30 guests.

For its part, Har Zion, on Bayview Avenue in Thornhill, spearheads a "mosaic" Out of the Cold initiative in York region. The shul uses its site to host 70 guests, including 25 overnight, on Wednesdays for eight weeks during the winter before handing the baton to neighbouring faith-based groups for the remainder of the season.

"We want to give them the experience of guests staying in a home. There's no proselytizing," said Har Zion president Steven Borlack.

Like the Narayever, Darchei Noam's efforts take place off-site. Its volunteers head to St. Matthew's United Church on St. Clair Avenue W., near Christie Street, every Thursday to help 45 guests stay warm, safe and fed for the night.

"Our philosophy is simple," Darchei Noam's website says. "To treat our guests as human beings – with respect and dignity, while trying to meet both their physical and emotional needs."

Over at Beth Sholom Synagogue, on Eglinton Avenue at Allen Road, Tuesday nights are reserved for its Out of the Cold activities.

It hosts more than 100 guests, and 60 stay overnight.

Spiritual leader Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich is proud of Beth Sholom's six years of participation in the program, and he can't stress its importance enough.

"It's a huge priority," he said. "Every congregation hopefully strives to create meaning. Systemically, we understand in Judaism that if our words are distanced too much from our deeds, that we're empty vessels. We understand that through our Out of the Cold project."

He noted that every Tuesday night he is reminded how lucky he is, and how cold and inhospitable the world can be for those waiting in line at his shul for nourishment and lodging.

"There are things that are beyond our control, like the parents who gave us life, opportunity and love," he said. "Not all those people had those things. But the world also has to be a compassionate place… everyone deserves it. How can I expect it for myself if I don't give it to others?"

Annex Shul thriving downtown

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the three months since it began holding services, the fledgling Annex Shul has acquired a mailing list of almost 500 people.

Its weekly Carlebach-style Friday night services at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life feature much singing, and a "trichitzah" that divides the room into three sections – one for men, one for women and one for mixed seating. Services are followed by a modestly priced catered dinner that costs $15, or $10 for students.

The congregation – a "traditional, inclusive" community that uses three different prayerbooks at each service – was the brainchild of Bram Belzberg, 26, who launched it in October with his friend Richard Meloff, 29.

Participants are mostly young professionals in the downtown area. Some come straight from work in their business suits, Belzberg said, although he himself wears jeans, and according to the shul's website, dress is informal. About 20 per cent of attendees are students.

Walk-ins are welcome, said Belzberg, although advance notice is appreciated.

Spontaneous discussions over dinner have included topics such as egalitarianism and "how Judaism fits in," said Meloff.

Sometimes dancing "breaks out" at dinner, or someone might offer a dvar Torah or a story. "It's very fluid," he added.

"It's a vibrant place where people engage," said Belzberg, a graduate of McGill University who is active in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. He was inspired to create the shul by his involvement as a student with Montreal's Ghetto Shul, a grassroots congregation in McGill's student ghetto.

"I love Carlebach [services] – the style, the scene, the dancing," Belzberg said. He also likes the mix of social and religious aspects, and has found that singing is his "favourite way of being spiritual."

After returning to Toronto about 18 months ago after a stint working for an investment bank in New York, Belzberg e-mailed about 150 friends and acquaintances – including friends he made as a youngster at Camp Ramah – with an outline of the type of congregation he wanted to create.

For Meloff – a consultant in financial services who returned to Toronto in September after working for three years at a New York law firm – the idea was particularly appealing.

He had attended New York's Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, and thought Belzberg's idea, which targeted people between 20 and 35, might be just what he was looking for when he came back to Canada. B'nai Jeshurun is known for its music- and energy-filled Friday night services, which revitalized the then-struggling congregation in the mid-1980s.

"My motivation was to create a shul I actually wanted to attend," Meloff said.

After the two of them teamed up to get the idea off the ground, 110 people showed up at the first Shabbat service. They invited anyone who was interested in helping make the endeavour successful to attend a meeting the following week.

The shul's philosophy, said Belzberg, is that it's a "grassroots, bottoms-up organization. We believe that this population is more driven to get involved in something they create on their own and more ready to identify with an organization they can create and that is created by their peers.

"What we're trying to do will allow the membership to dictate the direction of the shul."

Julie Weill, a 25-year-old who works for a software company, is one of more than a dozen young adults who came together in the earliest days to pitch in. "I was on the bandwagon from the second I found out about it," she said. "I'm not very religious, but… [the shul has] such an energy and such a community involvement."

Since its inception, the Annex Shul has formed a sports league, run study classes and a drum circle, and held a Chanukah party at a downtown gallery that was attended by more than 300 people. A Purim party is in the works.

The goal is a fully self-sufficient synagogue, said Meloff, adding that he and Belzberg are grateful for the support of Hillel of Greater Toronto, which has provided not only a place to hold events, but the services of Rabbi Aaron Levy.

Sources of hope

Nauseating and revolting claims by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that the Holocaust is a "fairy tale" cannot be ignored. He is, after all, the head of an important and influential Middle Eastern state whose loathsome words and ideas carry considerable weight among Muslims. But fortunately, as two recent events illustrate beyond any doubt, the leaders of the civilized world totally reject ignorant demagogues like Ahmadinejad, and this should be a source of encouragement and hope.

Germany, which recently assumed the presidency of the European Union, has proposed legislation that will make Holocaust denial and incitement to racism punishable by a prison sentence of up to three years in all of the EU's 27 member states. Explaining the rationale for the proposal, Germany's justice minister, Brigitte Zypries, observed: "We have always said that it can't be the case that it should still be acceptable in Europe to say the Holocaust never existed, and that six million Jews were never killed."

The proposal is sound on at least two grounds. Germany, where the greatest crime of the 20th century was conceived, has an enduring historical obligation to combat racism and xenophobia and preserve the memory of the Holocaust. Europe, some of whose inhabitants collaborated in the murder of Jews during World War II, is duty-bound to support Germany's proposal. Let us hope that its passage will not be blocked by groups and individuals who naively regard it as an infringement of free speech.

Last week, the president of France, Jacques Chirac, unveiled a plaque in Paris honouring some 2,700 French citizens who, at the risk to their own lives, saved Jews from anti-Semitic persecution and deportation during the German occupation. True, Vichy France shamefully assisted the Nazi occupiers. But it is vitally important to honour the men and women who remained faithful to the ideals of the French republic. The inscription on the plaque, which pays homage to les Justes, the righteous among the nations whose integrity and courage will never be forgotten, is a stinging rebuke to despicable Holocaust deniers such as Ahmadinejad. Significantly, it has been placed in the Pantheon, the final resting place of immortals such as Victor Hugo and Emile Zola. The message it sends to falsifiers of history is unmistakable.

The battle against Holocaust denial and racial discrimination can be won. –S.K.

Their pain is our pain

Unknown hoodlums vandalized a Muslim school in Montreal last week, and although police are not certain whether this was a racially motivated crime, Muslim community spokespersons have categorized it as a premeditated racist attack. Such cowardly attacks are not new. Last year, the United Talmud Torahs school in the Montreal suburb of St. Laurent was firebombed. Crimes such as these cannot be tolerated, being an ugly affront to Canadian democratic values. Muslims in Canada must never feel that they are alone when their institutions are under siege. The authorities should work day and night to solve this case. –S.K.

Canadian Jewish Congress withdrew from the Joint Community Relations Committee (JCRC), which it set up with B'nai Brith in 1938 to fight anti-Semitism, saying B'nai Brith repeatedly violated the JCRC contract and refused to contribute funds to the body. B'nai Brith denied the charges. Both groups said they would carry on separate community relations activities.

Claims of 'refugee' status ridiculous

As a Canadian who moved to Israel more than 14 years ago, I can attest to the complete humbug involved in the specious claims made by some Israeli citizens from the former Soviet Union that their children face harassment or abuse should they be forced to return from Canada to Israel ("Asylum seekers 'deliberately mislead,' CJN, Jan. 18). This claim is meant to justify their acceptance as "refugees" on your shores.

For someone to claim "refugee" status from Israel in order to weasel into Canada seems to me to be the height of chutzpah. If Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board is foolhardy enough to take these ridiculous claims seriously, Canada is welcome to these new "immigrants." I am sure that, as they did here, they will make fine, upstanding citizens – at least until they figure out the system on your shores.

International politics and unions

As a recently retired teacher from the Toronto District School Board and longtime member of District 12 of the Ontario Secondary Schools Teacher Federation (OSSTF), I am both embarrassed and appalled by special interest groups within my former federation.

It was just last May that Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario adopted a position to support the boycott against Israel, and that position was nurtured from top-level union leadership down. What is happening in unions today is dangerous because some members at either the leadership or grassroots level are stepping outside of the real purpose of unions – the well-being and professionalism of their members – and into international politics.

Teachers value themselves as independent thinkers and embody all religious faiths and political stripes. They resent being ventriloquized by special interest groups from within their ranks who have personal agendas. They expect their leaders to resist pronouncements on complicated issues outside of their normal sphere of expertise, and to resist adopting a political position on behalf of the entire federation.

How about pro-Israel union motions?

I have been following the issues surrounding the Ontario Secondary Schools Teacher Federation's (OSSTF) consideration of a motion to condemn Israel and support the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario's boycott of Israel. The OSSTF excuses its lack of responsibility for these motions by retreating to procedure: that the union must discuss an issue if two members of some 6,000 feel it's necessary.

I have the following suggestion: find two OSSTF members to sponsor a counter-motion to the proposed anti-Israel motion. Indeed, any number of motions could be proposed: a condemnation of suicide bombings as a crime against humanity, support for the Canadian government's position of Hamas as a terrorist organization, support for isolation of those who deliberately target civilians, or a condemnation of the civil violence among Palestinians that has been killing more people than the conflict between the Palestinians and Israel.

While we're at it, why stop with the OSSTF? If other unions have similar "rules," you can be sure that they will eventually be exploited by some anti-Israel group. Why not be proactive and begin forwarding pro-Israel motions around Canada?

Holocaust denial in Romania

I would like to share an example of Holocaust denial in Romania, a country that has recently joined the European Union. On Dec. 6, 2006, the Romanian Jewish newspaper Realitatea Evreiasca published a letter addressed to Romania's president, Traian Basescu, from Prof. Ion Coja. Some of the pearls of wisdom in Coja's letter include: "In Romania… there was no Holocaust. Who knows, maybe we will make a Holocaust some time. And we will make it properly."

Holocaust denial is punishable under Romanian law, but no such action has been taken by the Romanian government against the notorious anti-Semite Ion Coja.

Boyfriend's needs not considered

I am appalled by Sandie Benitah's attitude toward her boyfriend, love and marriage ("Moving in with the boyfriend," CJN, Jan. 11). Almost every one of her sentences includes the word "I." In determining whether he will be a suitable roommate, she only considers whether he can put up with her complete selfishness. She does not consider his needs, she does not consider how they might build a relationship together, and she does not mention the possibility of a future marriage. Living together for her is, therefore, a means for two people to obtain the maximum for themselves, not a co-operative venture.

Benitah seems to represent the modern Jewish woman with modern values. Surely it is time to replace these selfish and meaningless values with the basic Jewish moral values that apparently have been lost with the current "good life."

Can Ahmadinejad be charged?

By HOWARD S. SIMMONS and SAMUEL J. SIMMONS

In Julius Caesar, William Shakespeare presents a world where power can corrupt both the righteous and the greedy, where words are the ultimate power, and where action is always incited by cleverly used words.

In the play, words incite people to action on many occasions, from Cassius and his gang convincing Brutus to conspire to murder Caesar, to Brutus begging for assistance in his own suicide. Loyal and wise Antony uses brilliant language and reverse psychology in a speech that calls the citizens to riot. Temporary anarchy ensues when Cinna, a poet, the master of wordplay, is, rather symbolically, slain.

The importance of words cannot be underestimated, and verbal incitement to action is recognized as being as sharp as the sword.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran has committed an incitement to genocide. On many occasions, he has called for the destruction of Israel. He has declared that "Israel should be wiped off the map"; he has asked about the Jews, "are they human beings?"; and he has threatened that "they are nearing the last days of their lives." These are not simply threats against Israel as a country. They are wider attacks based on religion and hate.

But he he has also made vitriolic anti-Semitic statements, such as "the Jews are very filthy people"; they have "inflicted the most damage on the human race"; and they are "a bunch of bloodthirsty barbarians." These are not isolated incidents. They are just a few examples taken from his speeches. He has stated on several occasions that he considers the Holocaust a "fairy tale," and he recently organized a conference in Tehran to deny the Holocaust. Because of Iran's increasing military power and potential to have nuclear weapons, these threats are of great urgency.

The International Association of Genocide Scholars has expressed "profound alarm at openly aggressive statements made by the president of Iran." This alarm is not strictly of scholarly concern. The group has stated that calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and inciting students to scream "death to Israel" not only calls for the destruction of a national and religious group, the Jews of Israel, but, they say, it "has authorized creation of the materials needed to build the weapons to carry out his genocidal intent." This international and interdisciplinary group believes that all the early warning signs of a genocide are evident today in Iran. "Direct and public expression of genocidal intent by a national leader coupled with clear and present danger that genocidal acts will be committed is incitement to genocide."

There is a legal recourse available. In international law, a country that signs or ratifies a treaty or convention is legally bound by it. The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide ("Genocide Convention") has been in force since 1951. The convention has been signed by 138 countries, including Iran.

In addition to committing genocide itself, inciting others to commit genocide is a breach of the Genocide Convention. Article 3(c) states: "The following acts shall be punishable: (c) Direct and public incitement to commit genocide." The Genocide Convention is intended to prevent genocide, not just to punish perpetrators after a genocide has happened. In other words, even if genocide does not take place, "direct and public incitement to commit genocide" is sufficient to warrant punishment. Unfortunately, prosecution against individuals for incitement to commit genocide has only happened after genocides have occurred.

The crime of genocide is considered a crime against humanity and, as such, is a most grave violation that involves the most serious of consequences. Julius Streicher, the notorious publisher of a Nazi newspaper, was convicted after World War II at a Nuremberg trial for a crime against humanity. He had not been personally involved in the genocide against Jews, but he was convicted of "incitement to murder and extermination."

Even without the Genocide Convention, genocide would still be a crime against humanity and punishable under customary international law. But because of the horrors of the Nazi genocide, the world community demanded an even better mechanism to prevent and punish genocide. The Genocide Convention is intended to define genocide and confirm that genocide is a crime, whether committed in times of war or peace. The Genocide Convention is one of the most broadly accepted treaties in international law, and its importance extends beyond the 138 countries that have ratified it.

The recent genocide in Rwanda and its aftermath are instructive. Canadians have a greater knowledge of this genocide than do many other people. Words were the prelude to this genocide. There were early warning signs of the coming genocide long before the mass killings started. The Hutu-controlled radio stations were broadcasting attacks against the Tutsis, such as demanding the "elimination" of the "Tutsis cockroach." Later, the stations broadcast instructions to Hutus to murder Tutsis. Before the mass killings began, Maj.-Gen. Romeo Dallaire, a Canadian hero who commanded the United Nations mission in Rwanda, recognized the impending danger and sent many messages to the UN warning of the "catastrophic consequences" if the UN failed to act. The UN did fail to act, and in 1994 these "catastrophic consequences" became a horrible reality.

After the genocide, once approximately 800,000 people had been murdered, the UN set up the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda for the prosecution of individuals responsible for the genocide. Several people who were not directly involved in the murderous campaign were convicted for breaching the Genocide Convention by "direct and public incitement to commit genocide." The former prime minister of Rwanda himself was sentenced to life in prison for making public speeches inciting Hutus to commit acts of violence against Tutsis. These convictions provide clear precedents for charging Ahmadinejad.

Incitement to genocide?

We also have a Canadian example. Leon Mugesera, an active member of a hard-line Hutu political party, made a speech in 1992 to 1,000 people at a meeting of his party. He fled Rwanda in 1993 and succeeded in coming to Canada as a permanent resident. In 1995, Canada's immigration department opposed his remaining here because it claimed he had committed crimes against humanity, stating that he had been guilty of "direct and public incitement to commit genocide." There was no evidence that his speech led directly to any murders. Also, his speech did not clearly tell people to go out and murder. Ultimately, his case was heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, which confirmed the deportation.

Mugesera made his speech in 1992 and the genocide in Rwanda did not happen until 1994. No one proved that genocide happened because of his speech. Like the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the Supreme Court of Canada decided that it did not need proof that genocide happened when committing incitement to genocide. It said that "genocide falls within the category of crimes so serious that direct and public incitement to commit such a crime must be punished as such, even where such incitement failed to produce the result expected by the perpetrator."

An added challenge in deciding whether words or speeches do, in fact, incite action is that the process is wholly subjective, since only the intended audience is best equipped to understand what may be meant by certain words. To our ears, for example, much of Mugesera's speech could sound strange, even benign. It's full of references that are unknown to us, and therefore lacking in political potency. But spoken to the right audience, his words are lethal.

During the Rwandan genocide, the Hutu president of the interim government called on Rwandans to "get to work." For Hutus, this meant using machetes and axes to kill Tutsis. Mugesera said, referring to the Tutsis, that their "home is in Ethiopia, that we will send you by the Nyabarongo so you can get there quickly." To his audience, this meant that Tutsis should be killed and that the Nyabarongo River, a tributary of the Nile River that flows into Ethiopia, should be used to ship their corpses to Ethiopia. In fact, during the genocide of 1994, many Tutsi bodies were systematically thrown into the Nyabarongo River because of a racist myth propagated by Hutus that Tutsis had "long noses" and came from Ethiopia.

The Supreme Court of Canada wrote that the direct and public incitement to genocide "should be viewed in light of its cultural and linguistic content… a particular speech may be perceived as 'direct' in one country and not so in another, depending on the audience." The court concluded that in this case, "this message was delivered in a public place at a public meeting and would have been clearly understood by the audience."

A prosecution of Ahmadinejad is possible. Enforcement is now in the hands of the world community. Martin Luther King, Jr. wrote that "in the end, we will remember not the words of our enemies, but the silence of our friends."

This is no time for any of us to be silent.

Road hazards

In the coalition negotiations that followed the last general election in Israel, the defence portfolio held by Shaul Mofaz, a former Chief of Staff, was given to Amir Peretz, leader of the Labor Party. Mofaz was demoted to minister of transport. Good soldier that he is, he vowed to fight the carnage on Israel's roads, part of his new portfolio, with the same vigour and determination that he fought the enemy on the battlefield.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

After less than a year in office, he has something to show for it. Road fatalities in 2006 went down by 10 per cent.

But although they used to be still higher, they remain far too high. Almost 450 women, men and children were killed on Israel's roads last year, and many more were injured. It may not be the highest road accident rate in the world, but it is nevertheless alarming. Over the years, many more Israelis have died on the roads than in wars and terror attacks.

Apart from the usual reasons cited – poor roads, insufficiently maintained vehicles, incompetent drivers, speeding and road rage – there is also the menace of drunkenness. That didn't use to be a factor in the early days of the state, but Israelis are becoming more and more like other peoples – yet another instance when the Zionist dream to be "normal" has become something of a nightmare.

The Jewish state prides itself on caring for the lives of every individual. Think of the readiness to release a disproportionate number of Palestinian prisoners to get one Israeli captive back from Gaza.

Why, then, is more not being done to reduce road accidents?

Apart from the reasons cited, there prevails an attitude that seems to negate the avowed commitment to the preservation of life. For example, there are still too many Israeli pedestrians who seem to act as if traffic lights are for sissies, and there are still too many Israeli drivers who behave as if pedestrian crossings are road decorations. Many of the victims are pedestrians, including, recently, one of Israel's foremost thinkers, Aviezer Ravitsky.

Will Mofaz be able to change the culture? That, of course, is very difficult and takes a long time. Yet his efforts, and his modest but significant results, should be applauded. They are as vital as the endeavours by the Israel Defence Forces to protect and save the lives of citizens.

People in Canada, citing what they read and hear, often ask me if it's dangerous to live in Israel. Though terrorism is still a threat and war is always a possibility, statistically, the greatest danger I face is when I try to cross the street.

Remembering an Israeli summer

As universities reconvene for the winter semester, students will inevitably return to frigid temperatures and daytime darkness.

In only a few months though, sweatshirts and toques will be replaced by tanktops and bandanas. Certainly a preferable change if you ask me, despite the easiest winter we have had in recent memory (except on the West Coast – sorry B.C., your stockpile of nice weather has finally run out). The global warming gremlins provided central Canada with barely a snowflake to enjoy during the recent holiday season.

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

Nonetheless, the annual school break pilgrimage to sunshine saw thousands of North American students transplanted out of the cold, and to Israel courtesy of birthright and other programs. Participants were surprised, however, by the Israeli weather's shocking resemblance to Canadian winters: snow and sub-zero temperatures in the Holy Land? Blasphemy.

I, being one of the unlucky applicants, can only relate those experiences because of my top-prize reconnaissance source: Facebook, a social network website for college and university students. From what I have gathered, all my friends in Israel were cold and all my friends in Toronto were warm. I, on the other hand, swished my feet around the sandy floor of a beachfront bar watching the NFL playoffs in Belize. I guess I can't complain.

As the tropical sun beat down on my back, I was reminded of strolling down the Tayelet in Jerusalem this past summer. But whereas Belize has tropical serenity, Israel has a Middle Eastern crisis.

When I led Hashomer Hatzair's Yedid Plus program to Israel this summer, the Hezbollah-Israel conflict became real for myself and for my chanichim – my campers.

After nervously watching too many cycles of 24-hour news networks during the weeks before our trip, we still proceeded. Habonim Dror and most other youth movements already had their groups in Israel, and the Jewish Agency's security desk claimed we would be fine. We're also well known for being in the more daring crowd – but that's for another column.

To the chagrin of many parents, we embarked when rockets were still landing on Kiryat Shmonah and the surrounding region. Luckily, the trip itinerary involved mainly travel through the centre and south of the country. By mid-August, Israel had enacted a ceasefire and we were given permission to see Haifa's Baha'i Gardens and other northern gems such as the Kinneret (the Sea of Galilee).

What I could not predict for my chanichim were the random moments of reality we faced when the crisis jumped from news stories to our stories. Residents of the north were dispersed throughout the country, literally. Every hotel and hostel was jammed to capacity with fleeing families. At one hotel, I was told, "Residents from the north can shower and eat free. So, which town are you from?" One of the few times in my life being Canadian was actually a shortcoming!

Touring through the military cemetery in Jerusalem, we encountered a funeral for a recently fallen soldier. Scores of uniformed soldiers, some probably friends, others mere acquaintances, silently wept. Necks craned to glimpse the Israeli flag-draped casket. The sweating shoulders of the pallbearers were proudly adorned with the Magen David. Soon, a dishevelled young soldier, probably around my age, was wheeled in by his unit mates. An amputated right foot and a dark bullet wound in his neck signalled his luck in triumphing over death.

These tragic scenes seemed to vanish just days later when I found myself shouting the familiar words "Yachad" (together) and "Ani ve'ata" (you and I) on a grassy lawn where beer flowed to hundreds of satisfied youth. A purely Israeli creation, Shira veBeera combined two of my greatest loves: cheap alcohol and corny Israeli folk songs. For only 30 shekels, the kibbutz party had lots of food, lots of singing and even more beer. A house band projected lyrics from a giant screen to aid the less lyrically inclined.

Panning the crowd, I realized that almost every single person was of army age – the girl on my left, an army officer; the guy on my right, a future navy ship captain. Despite the struggles of the crisis, violence would wait and Beera and Broza would reign supreme.

These are the moments I remember from the crisis; I can only hope that the memories of rebuilding were not so bittersweet.

Change in the weather

Like much of the world, Halifax has been suffering lately from a bit of environmental confusion.

Normally, January is an impossibly cold month in which even the bravest of souls dons a hat and gloves, and sometimes even an extra pair of socks. During my first year in this city, my way of dealing with these often below-30 temperatures was pure avoidance. I was living on campus and it wasn't long before I discovered that most of the buildings are connected by underground tunnels. This meant that I could attend to most of my basic needs – eating, sleeping and going to lectures – without ever stepping foot outside. And indeed, at one point during a January freeze, I managed to avoid going outdoors for three days by slipping through the tunnels like a mouse in hiding.

Mordechai Wulfish in Halifax

But things changed once I left the campus bubble and was forced to face the elements in order to buy my groceries and go to class. Once November rolled around, I had to put my beloved bike away and brace myself for the long haul of the Halifax winter. Throughout these cold months, I would curse the winter weather, which, if I took a shower in the morning, would literally freeze my hair by the time I got to school.

But as annoying as the freeze can be, facing the prospect of a warm Halifax winter just seems wrong. I like to look outside in the morning and actually know what season it is. And having a cold winter ensures that you don't take the warmth of summer for granted.

As well, having to deal with the weather is, to me, also an essential part of the Canadian Jewish experience. Unlike our friends in Israel, we must face questions such as: will it be too cold to sit in my sukkah? Or, will my outdoor June bar mitzvah be rained out? I would actually prefer to slog through normal winter months in Halifax rather than see the entire world turn into a perpetual Hawaii.

But superficial musings aside, the issue of climate change is becoming one of prominent concern. Indeed, we hear every day that the rise in temperatures all around us is being caused by global greenhouse gas emissions that are creating major disruptions in our weather systems.

The politicians in our country are climbing on the environmental bandwagon, each trying to show that their concern about this issue is greater than the other's. Jewish environmental groups have also placed this issue at the forefront, capitalizing on increasing public awareness of the harmful effects of climate change. They argue that there is a uniquely Jewish responsibility to respond to the growing disrepair of our environment, stemming from the Jewish imperative of tikkun olam, ensuring that we do not destroy the world for future generations.

Here in Halifax, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, led by a concerned congregant, is hosting Halifax's first climate change symposium, a partnership between the Jewish community and the Climate Change Centre of Nova Scotia.

While most people are pleased, and should be, that this issue has finally entered public consciousness, others say the concern with climate change is just a passing fad rather than an informed response by the public.

But the environment is no longer seen as the concern of those "wacky hippies." Dalhousie University announced last week that it's getting rid of Styrofoam in its food service operations and is even reverting to forks made of bamboo, which are biodegradable – unlike plastic ones.

Growing up as the only one among my friends whose family had a compost pile (the concept of which perplexed both my friends and me at the time), I welcome this popularization of environmental "fads."

As the experts have realized, if people begin to take small actions on their own every day, change will occur. While not everyone can thoughtfully articulate the reasons why we should be changing our lifestyles – even if ever so slightly – in this case, actions count, whether or not they're a result of total knowledge of the subject.

These "fads" allow people with the expertise to teach us something. Hopefully, the changes we make will be more than temporary.

The Kirshner File

Hamas' rejectionism jeopardizes Palestinian cause

It has been exactly a year since Hamas unexpectedly swept to victory in the Palestinian parliamentary election, leaving its stunned Fatah rival sputtering in disbelief and Israel reeling in shock.

Its triumph was widely regarded as surprising because Hamas–the Islamic Resistance Movement – was said to command the allegiance of only one-third of the Palestinian electorate. Yet Hamas won 44 per cent of the vote, a plurality good enough to sweep Fatah aside. In the last such election in the Palestinian Authority, in 1996, Fatah, with Yasser Arafat at the helm, was the clear winner. With Arafat's untimely death in 2004, Mahmoud Abbas replaced him, then won the 2005 presidential election.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Hamas' accession to power represented a radical shift in Palestinian politics. It signified that the 3.5 million Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip would no longer be governed by a party committed to a secular nationalist vision and a two-state solution, but by a party striving to create an Islamic state and struggling to eradicate Israel.

In a sense, the results confounded analysts, since surveys had indicated that most Palestinians were ready to coexist with Israel within the context of a peace agreement. But when Palestinian voters went to the polls on Jan. 25, 2006, the prospect of peace with Israel was not uppermost in their minds. What really animated them was their perception that Fatah's mismanagement, corruption and cronyism had reduced the Palestinian Authority to an ineffectual body.

But in turfing out Fatah, the Palestinians are now paying a heavy price for their dissatisfaction. Hamas, which has been branded as a terrorist group by western nations, including Canada, pledged to deliver "reform and change" to the long-suffering Palestinians. In speech after speech on the hustings, their leaders assured voters that Hamas would bring honesty, integrity and transparency to government, revitalize the anemic economy and rein in the lawlessness that has convulsed the Palestinian Authority since its establishment in 1994 under the imprimatur of the Oslo accords.

But much to the disillusionment of many Palestinians, Hamas has fallen far short of its objectives, while ushering in a period of unprecedented uncertainty and instability, increasingly deadly internecine warfare with Fatah that threatens to erupt into a full-fledged civil war, hostility from Israel and isolation and opprobrium on the international stage.

Rarely have the fortunes of the Palestinians been as bleak as they are today.

The problem, in large measure, stems from Hamas' ideological rigidity and flight from reality. Hamas, in its charter, neither recognizes Israel's existence nor accepts the concept of peace negotiations with Israel. To Hamas purists, Palestine is a Muslim patrimony, and territorial compromise with the Zionist enemy is completely out of the question. Which is precisely why Hamas refuses to recognize Israel, renounce terrorism or embrace the agreements Fatah and Israel have signed over the years.

Due to its refusal to abide by these conditions, as set out by Israel, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations, Hamas has recklessly forfeited international aid – but not basic humanitarian assistance – to the tune of more than $1 billion and monthly tax and customs revenues worth $55 million, collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinians. Consequently, Hamas has been hard-pressed to meet its most basic obligation: the payment of salaries to some 160,000 Palestinian civil servants and police.

In a desperate attempt to overcome its overarching financial problems, Hamas has managed to smuggle about $66 million through the Rafah border crossing in the last eight months and, in a sop to government employees, has doled out payments in lieu of regular salaries.

But the smuggling of funds is hardly a reliable method of circumventing the harsh economic sanctions, the bane of the current Palestinian regime. Last month, Israel refused to let Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh cross into Gaza from Egypt unless he relinquished $35 million in funds he solicited on a tour of the Muslim world.

Iran has given Hamas hundreds of millions of dollars in assistance, but how much of it has actually reached Gaza and the West Bank remains to be seen. The Arab League has pledged more than $100 million in aid, but little of it has been forthcoming. The United Nations has requested $450 million from member states to cover health and education costs, but this is merely a stopgap sum.

Hamas has therefore exacerbated the plight of the Palestinians. In a recent report on the Palestinian Authority, the World Bank estimated that its economy would decline by 27 per cent, that personal income would shrink by one-third, that unemployment would jump from a pre-election level of 23 per cent to 40 per cent, and that the proportion of Palestinians living in poverty would climb from 44 percent in 2005 to 67 per cent in 2007.

The harsh conditions in the Palestinian Authority may further radicalize its downtrodden population, a development that can only benefit Hamas and be detrimental to Israel's long-term interests.

Hamas could break the impasse by heeding Fatah's call to recognize Israel. Recognition of Israel would presumably enable Hamas to form a national unity government with Fatah and thus pave the way for the cancellation of the economic boycott and the resumption of peace talks with Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said he would negotiate with such a joint Hamas-Fatah government, while Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres has conceded that Hamas could be an important force in any peace process. Yet Hamas stubbornly hews to its rejectionist stance. Last week, Haniyeh told Hezbollah's television station that he will never recognize Israel, a position his colleagues in the Hamas cabinet have repeatedly reiterated.

At best, to quote Haniyeh, Hamas is prepared to sign a lengthy ceasefire with Israel once the Palestinians have achieved full statehood in Gaza and the West Bank. Haniyeh's senior adviser, Ahmed Yousef, fleshed out the details in a recent op-ed piece in the New York Times. In a remarkably similar statement, Khaled Mashal, a leading Hamas figure based in Damascus, has admitted that Israel is "a fact" he grudgingly accepts.

Half-baked, backhanded acknowledgements of Israel's existence, however, will not convince the West to drop its sanctions against the Hamas regime, nor will they persuade Fatah to form a unity government with Hamas.

For the past few months, Abbas has valiantly tried to bring Hamas into line with these fundamental realities, but to no avail, with the upshot that he has threatened to call early presidential and parliamentary elections in a bid to displace Hamas.

These seething tensions have produced a titanic power struggle and triggered a series of violent skirmishes in Gaza that have claimed the lives of dozens of Palestinian combatants and civilians. "These clashes must stop, this bloodshed must end," Haniyeh has declared in a plea for Palestinian amity. But as long as he declines to face facts, Hamas will be subjected to sanctions, and the Palestinian cause will suffer. In the meantime, the United States and its allies in the region – Israel, Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia – have thrown their political and military support behind Abbas as Fatah and Hamas move ominously closer to a fratricidal war.

Chai Lifeline helps kids with serious illnesses

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Ask 11-year-old Robert Jones if he wants to watch a homemade family video and you'll likely get an indifferent shrug of the shoulders. Ask him about viewing a video of Camp Simcha and he jumps at the opportunity.

"I really enjoy Camp Simcha," he enthuses. "You can forget about all your worries in life there and just have fun."

Located in upstate New York, the camp provides a joyous reprieve for children with cancer and other life-threatening illnesses.

It's one of several programs and services offered by Chai Lifeline, a not-for-profit organization dedicated to helping kids with serious health problems and their families.

"Something that's a little different about pediatric illnesses is that it really affects the entire family," says Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, executive director of Chai Lifeline Canada.

"We try to provide programs that give that extra needed care to the child, their siblings and the parents. And we never ask for payment from families."

Launched in New York in 1986, Chai Lifeline now has regional offices in five American states, as well as Israel and England, and it's been in Canada for a few years.

The Canadian office recently ramped up its diverse network of programs to include everything from family counselling and tutoring services to Big Brother and Big Sister programs and toy drives.

The Jones' learned about Chai Lifeline while Robert was at the Hospital for Sick Children receiving care for leukemia.

Robert initially linked up with a Chai Big Brother who later referred him to the camp.

"At Camp Simcha, they make a conscientious effort that all kids share in the same fun," says Robert's mother, Rona Geringer.

"And they are also very concerned about the kid's medical conditions and accommodate kids across all spectrums."

To that end, the camp has medical professionals onsite, including oncologists and nurses, who can cater to the children's medical issues, if necessary.

While Chai Lifeline is still relatively new in Canada, it's making an indelible mark.

"If you talk to any of our families, they will tell you what a difference we make in their lives," Rabbi Rothman says.

"We just want to be there for you and do whatever we can for your family."

Robert Jones, left, dons a wacky hat at Camp Simcha

In addition to his summers at Camp Simcha, Robert has also travelled to Orlando, Fla., on a trip organized by Chai Lifeline.

"It was probably one of the most amazing trips of my life," he says.

Robert's father Frank says Chai's programs haven't just provided his son with fun and entertainment, but they have also taught him to appreciate what he has.

"Robert sits down and writes thank-you letters to the people at Chai Lifeline, because he has become so appreciative of how people have gone out of their way for him," Frank says.

There are about 50 Chai Lifeline volunteers in Canada and Rabbi Rothman says the organization always welcomes more help.

If you're interested in volunteering or in inquiring about Chai Lifeline's unique programs, visit www.chailifelinecanada.org or phone 647-430-5933.

Montreal Y motivated $12M gift for Toronto JCC

"We're still Montrealers at heart."

With those words, Ron Prosserman summed up for The Canadian Jewish News the sentiments of his entire family not long after family patriarch – and former Montrealer – Martin Prosserman pledged $12 million toward building a new $100-million Jewish community centre in Toronto that will bear the family name.

It will replace the 45-year-old JCC building near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue. Construction is slated to begin this fall and be completed three years later.

Even though the new Prosserman Family JCC will be located in Toronto, the elder Prosserman said it was his intimate connection to the Y in Montreal that motivated him to make the donation.

Now 75, Prosserman – who until 11 years ago was the owner of the Moores menswear clothing chain – grew up humbly in the postwar Montreal neighbourhood made famous by Mordecai Richler, and he found a haven at the legendary Mount Royal institution, as he explained to the National Post when the gift was announced this past fall.

Since his family's home had no hot running water, Prosserman would go to the Y, and for a nickel he would get a bar of soap, a towel and a shower.

"I could do all that because someone was paying for it," he told the newspaper. "I knew someone… was subsidizing it, because they weren't going to get fat on five cents for soap and a towel!"

Prosserman's discovery of the Y was also pure serendipity.

On his first day in Montreal at age eight after moving here from Toronto with his Ukrainian immigrant family – "We could starve just as easily in Montreal," he once said – he walked up St. Lawrence Boulevard and happened to make a right turn on Mount Royal.

At the Y, he took part in many activities, and he even met his first wife, Ellen, there. She died in 2002 after 46 years of marriage, and the family has said that the new JCC, perhaps more than anything else, will honour her memory.

This past fall in Toronto, at a ceremony at Prosserman's private investment firm attended by sons Ron, Gary and Brian, Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, described how he could tell that Prosserman wanted to do something to show his gratitude for what the Y did for him.

"I saw it in Martin's eyes," Sokolsky said.

Discussions about the project with the publicity-shy family go back five years.

The Prosserman JCC is part of the Toronto Jewish Community's Tomorrow Campaign, which is creating three new "campuses" in the Toronto area. The other two are downtown and in Vaughan, a northern suburb.

The campaign's target amount is $250 million. It's being chaired by businessmen Lawrence Tanenbaum and Gerald Schwartz.

Kids should like what they read, teacher says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Alana Vertlieb brings dual passions for drama and literacy to her Grade 3 general studies classroom at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill.

The 27-year-old teacher – sporting beaded braids like some of her students when she returned to class after a winter break honeymoon with her husband, who is also a teacher – says that literacy "comes into play in everything we do."

Literacy problems, she noted, don't affect children only when they read literature, but also in situations where they have to learn from a textbook or follow written instructions.

Vertlieb believes it's important for young children to like what they're reading. "It's OK to read comic books or magazines… Sometimes it's important to know that reading is reading."

A graduate of York University, where she received a bachelor's degree with a major in Jewish studies and a minor in theatre, Vertlieb also has a BEd and an M.Sc. in education, with a specialty in literacy, from Canisius College in Buffalo, N.Y.

A smile lights up her face as she talks about her chosen career and being at a Jewish school – "I love it," she says. "It's a very homey environment."

Vertlieb has been at Associated since her days as a student teacher. She started supply teaching there last January before being offered a full-time job.

A graduate of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Vertlieb was active in United Synagogue Youth while growing up in Dundas, Ont., and spent her summers at Camp Ramah from the time she was eight until she was 22.

She developed an interest in drama, and in teaching, after participating in the March of the Living in 1996.

A lesson from the teacher: "I think it's important to remember that kids are kids and need to have fun... Sometimes it's good to take learning to another level and make it fun or theatrical."

The experience inspired her to co-write a play about the Holocaust, Everyone has a Name. It won several awards from the Sears Ontario Drama Festival.

Outside of her working hours, Vertlieb and Kim Pollishuke, a friend from university who is also a teacher, are launching a theatre school for kids called Stage Right Theatre Company. Classes are set to begin this summer.

Vertlieb, who was youth director at Holy Blossom Temple last year, sees parallels between teaching and directing, the area of theatre she is most interested in. Realizing what students – or in theatre, actors – have to know, assessing them, and teaching or directing in a way that suits their individual needs are important aspects of both, she says.

But as a teacher in a Jewish day school, she says, one of her biggest challenges is covering the general studies curriculum in half a day.

Also, she adds, she likes to enhance the program with art and drama. Sometimes she has students draw or act out scenes from books as a way of incorporating arts into the curriculum.

"It's important that [students] have fun and have time to express their feelings," she says.

Teachers' motion condemns all violence

"I personally complained to a member of the executive," Orenstein said, and he also wrote an open letter to Jolliffe about the D12 Voice being employed to bash Israel.

When he learned that the January STBU council meeting would consider another anti-Israel motion, "I felt I had to do something."

Teachers at his school – both Jewish and non-Jewish – agreed the union should not even address the Middle East conflict, he said.

To counter the anti-Israel resolution, Orenstein and other teachers prepared a motion for the January STBU council meeting that condemned all violence, called for a two-state solution, and urged Palestinian and Israeli educators to "be in contact for the purpose of broadening understanding between the two groups."

An information package addressing the issue was sent to all branch presidents in the district urging them to vote against the Israel-bashing resolution.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said his organization "received dozens of phone calls from teachers who were concerned about the direction the union might be taking.

"Congress was not neutral on this issue and we gave advice to teachers and made sure teachers who felt the same way had the opportunity to speak to each other," he said.

"We are pleased with the outcome of the evening… [District 12 STBU council] had the opportunity to hear from teachers committed to fairness and balance who did not wish their union to be involved in affairs of the world in such an unbalanced and unhelpful way. Saner heads prevailed."

B'nai Brith Canada responded to the votes by noting, "The many positive responses we have received this morning indicate that what teachers want is to focus on their true mandate – to ensure students have the tools they need to contribute to a vibrant civil society in Canada. They do not want their classrooms to be turned into a political battle ground to satisfy the bias of a few OSSTF members."

Prior to the vote, B'nai Brith issued a news release urging "all OSSTF members and concerned citizens to let the voices of democracy be heard." B'nai Brith called the one-sided resolutions attacking Israel an attempt to politicize the classroom and a distortion of union politics by those who want to "leave in their wake lies and mistrust."

The District 12 STBU responded with its own release condemning B'nai Brith and the Jewish Defense League, which picketed the council meeting, "for what it believes amounts to a bullying campaign launched against OSSTF and its members."

"This can be seen as nothing short of an attempt to intimidate our membership," said Jolliffe.

"The executive understands the emotional response these kinds of ideas provokes. We have had to grapple with that ourselves as voting members of this meeting and certainly we know that our membership is not a monolith when it comes to these motions, or in fact any other motion that might come before our council for debate. However, for an outside organization to encourage and engage in this kind of heavy-handed, intimidating action before a decision as to whether these motions are ones we can support, is absurd."

In response B'nai Brith issued another news release saying that the "OSSTF has claimed that our informational alerts to CUPE teachers and interested community members in advance of the vote constitute bullying. We have to wonder why this organization sees the factual information we circulated on the issues being discussed as so threatening. By bringing the issue to the forefront and providing the necessary contextual information, we helped teachers make an informed decision on this attempt to co-opt them by default to an overtly anti-Israel agenda."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

The changing character of Jerusalem

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Stories of religious families impossibly cramped into tiny Jerusalem apartments are nothing new. Units that were originally designed for one couple and a child, or maybe two, somehow manage to stretch and house two parents and a half dozen of their children. Even finding a dozen people in a small, two-bedroom flat is not uncommon.

How is it possible, you may ask? Parents occupy one bedroom – usually the smallest. With them sleeps a baby or the youngest child. Daughters – all of them – fill the second room, sleeping on bunks, rollaways pull-outs, or all of the above, with two or more to a bed. The dining and living room area does double duty: as night falls, it becomes a dormitory for boys. They sleep on sofas, bring out mattresses or unroll foam pads. During warm weather, some will sleep on the balcony. Virtually every square foot of floor space will be utilized.

In these apartments, mornings often start with the untangling of limbs, as well as with packing up assorted bedding and clearing paths just to be able to walk around. Lines then form in front of the bathroom, which, of course, becomes the most coveted and used room in the house.

These rituals are so common that they're universally accepted. In fact, an apartment with a single occupant is rare in Jerusalem.

Real estate prices are high in Israel's capital, which has has always been a Jewish destination. Jews from abroad who purchase second homes in Israel often buy them in Jerusalem. Children of large families grow up and start their own families. The result of these pressures is that for most people, home ownership in Jerusalem is an impossible dream.

In response, new communities have been built on the city's periphery. By and large, homes there are not only larger, newer and more affordable, they're also better designed to meet the needs of large religious families. Kitchens are laid out with kashrut in mind. Balconies are sukkah-friendly and not built one on top of the other. Buildings are low rise, and children's playgrounds are an integral part of the infrastructure.

Still, there is a strong desire to live in the central parts of Jerusalem. This has led to a new phenomenon: neighbourhoods going black.

Black, or haredi, neighbourhoods are usually well-defined. One street is often all that divides haredim from non-haredim: areas on one side are all secular, and exclusively haredi on the other.

Instead of leaving Jerusalem, haredim are expanding their neighbourhoods and even overtaking entire areas. Ramat Eshkol, Kiryat Yovel, Neve Yaacov and the Ramot are just some of the places that are either in the process of becoming, or have been fully converted to, haredi neighbourhoods.

This gradual process is by no means smooth. The changing nature of a neighbourhood may be natural, but like the ever-changing phases in the life of a person, it's usually more awkward than graceful.

For instance, since the use of elevators is not allowed on Shabbat, a haredi move into an area will begin on the first three to four floors of neighbourhood buildings.

In general, the two lifestyles clash. Local restaurants and retailers will feel the pressure to change with the new inhabitants. Hence, clothing stores will offer fashions that are acceptable to them. Food outlets will scramble to acquire kosher certification or upgrade their existing hechsher. Even news kiosks change, first covering the fronts of their more provocative publications, then eventually selling only those that are bought by the public.

In all, Jerusalem is slowly acquiring a new character.

Our Cuban bar mitzvah

By GILLIAN FARBER

Guest Voice

Unusual as this may be, Cuba will become part of our family's religious history.

I know it seems like a peculiar place to hold such a significant celebration, but for our family, the decision to have my youngest brother, Max's bar mitzvah in Havana, Cuba, was the beginning of an adventure we would never forget.

I was the only person in my family who had travelled to Cuba prior to the bar mitzvah. For our high school graduation, six of my friends and I had decided to vacation in Varadero.

My brother was 11 at the time, and my family had already arranged two bar mitzvahs, but the planning for Max's bar mitzvah was different.

Rumours circulated in the family that we might climb Mount Everest, trudge up to the North Pole or have this simchah in a submerged banquet hall underwater in the Mediterranean Sea. But then my mother thought that Cuba, with its small community of Jews, might welcome our celebration.

My father, through his work with Canadian Jewish Congress had helped raise money to provide the Cuban Jewish community with kosher for Passover food, and he knew what a huge mitzvah such a simchah could be.

I, of course, remembering my past trip to Cuba, was not going to turn down another vacation to the sun. My brother Zachary, a budding musician, has been wanting a bongo drum for the last year, so he was a definite go. As for the bar mitzvah boy, Max just needed reassurance that he wouldn't have to learn a new parshah.

After a year of planning and working out the arrangements, my parents had it all pay off when we arrived at the quaint Jose Martin international airport in Havana. The fresh smell of cigars, tropical fruit and exhaust from cars that were older than all my siblings put together filled the air. My family and I, along with 50 of our friends and family enjoyed a three-night stay in Havana and a seven-night stay in Varadero.

We toured Havana during the day and did salsa dancing at night. La Plaza de la Revolution was overwhelming. We could picture Fidel Castro there, delivering one of his famous two-hour soliloquies.

Despite assurances from our bus guide that there is no distinction between rich and poor in Cuba, we couldn't help but notice the abject poverty most Cubans live with on a daily basis. Still, the people were amazing – kind, gentle and warmhearted. We walked around Havana day and night in complete safety and with no fear.

The Havana synagogue was located in the small Jewish community of about 1,100 near the heart of city. It was truly a beautiful shul. Unfortunately, with so many Jews having left Cuba, the synagogue did not have a rabbi or a cantor. My parents decided to bring the cantor from our shul, Shaar Shalom in Markham, Ont. Cantor Ben Silverberg, who taught Max his bar mitzvah portion, thus accompanied us to Havana, where he led the services on Friday night and Saturday.

More than 100 members of Havana's Jewish community joined in our simchah, and from this I learned a valuable lesson. No matter where in the world we Jews may find ourselves, we will always have a connection one to another. And even though most of us were unable to speak Spanish, I found it fascinating how we could communicate with our Cuban brothers and sisters through the Torah. Our ancient Hebrew language became the glue that bound us as one family. We sang together, danced together, ate together and celebrated Max's bar mitzvah together.

Max's bar mitzvah fell on Chanukah. Before leaving Canada, our group, thanks to Apotex pharmaceuticals, packed into our suitcases countless medicines needed by the Cuban Jewish community. The synagogue runs Cuba's largest pharmacy, open to all, and these medicines became our gift to the community.

I expect that the memories of this trip will stay with us forever. In fact, I can envision that one day, my brothers and I will tell our grandchildren about our 10 special days in Cuba and about a bar mitzvah that was hardly ordinary.

Simchovitch's poems sensitive, outspoken

The Fiery Mountain* by Simcha Simchovitch, Simchovitch Book Fund.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Over a period of 50 years, Simcha Simchovitch has produced more than 10 volumes of Yiddish poetry, a well-received novel and a great many essays. A Toronto resident, now 85, he was born and reared in the small town of Otwock, not far from Warsaw.

He is esteemed for his virtuosity, deft and arresting use of the Yiddish language and his sensitive concern for human pain and suffering. He is also commended for the surprising range of his subject matter.

The Fiery Mountain is bilingual, with the Yiddish and the English rendering of the poems placed side by side. The 110 poems include recollection of the poet's childhood, reflections on the Holocaust and his coming to terms with postwar life in Israel, Canada and the world at large.

In a poem titled Even Though, the poet confesses, "Even though the calamity pulsates/ in every vein of my being/ and the pits, the mass graves/ which I have evaded/ like a shadow follow me/ still I want/ to exult in human joy/ to love and live,/and even to forgive."

From Aushwitz Elegy comes this lament for the dead: "The last spasms of bodies/ embraced, twisted and jammed,/ the pangs and convulsions of death,/ the mute cries to Heaven/ O lives extinguished, dear shadows/ of our own flesh and blood,/ with hearts drowned in sorrow/ we mourn and bewail you."

Wonderful City is not without sin and iniquity: "You won't cover up,/ Wonderful City,/ with your boulevards and palaces/of the poverty/ that nests in back alleys,/ rooming houses, attics,/ where people languish/ in loneliness, in filth./ And you will not redeem,/ Wonderful City,/ with your galleries and statues/ the shame of streetwalkers/ who on this April day/ wait for anyone to profane/ their young, holy bodies."

This collection of poems – sensitive, outspoken and heartfelt – deserves a wide and appreciative readership.

The Atheist's Bible* by Shalom Camenietzki, Thistledown Press.

Shalom Camenietzki, the author of this volume of 15 short stories, is a practising Toronto psychologist. He was raised in Israel and educated in the United States.

Most of the stories have been published in Canadian magazines, including the Dalhousie Review and Parchment. The stories are largely about Toronto Jews who suffer from a variety of emotional and psychological problems. They see only failure in their marriages and careers and are obsessed with impossible dreams and ambitions.

In the book's title story, a stubborn and cantankerous old man has spent 15 years in composing an annotated anthology of atheistic philosophers from the ancient Greeks to Sartre. After his death, his son who had viewed his father's task as madness, refuses to accept the requests of a publisher who wants to make minor changes in the book. The unusual story has a surprise ending.

A number of the stories are too brief for the depiction of character in depth. But Camenietzki quickly commands the reader's interest. He has a sharp ear for dialogue and a keen eye for telling detail. As a psychologist he confronts the reader with new insights into human motivation and behaviour.

Jerusalem of White

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

While winter was slow to come to most of North America, things have been quite different in Israel. An early winter storm blanketed Jerusalem and brought much of the country's mountainous regions to a standstill. Although Jerusalem gets a sprinkling of snow most winters, real storms are still a fascination for residents of the capital. Thanks to the Internet, we can share in the wonder of this winter's Jerusalem of White.

The best place to start your tour is at YouTube for videos [http://youtube.com] and Flickr for photos. [http://flickr.com] Go to those sites and search for "Israel snow" or for "Jerusalem snow." You'll find hundreds of entries, including a video demonstrating what must be the universal reflex of people experiencing their first snowfall: trying to catch as many flakes on your tongue as possible. [http://tinyurl.com/yh89f2]

After the large storm of 2000, the Jerusalem Post sent a photographer to cover the city. You can take a look at several popular neighbourhoods in snow, and then there's Meir, who decided that cross-country skiing is faster than walking in downtown Jerusalem. [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Snow/] Guy Shachar has created several lovely PowerPoint shows about snow (among many others) that you can download and enjoy. [http://tinyurl.com/yn8rz7]

Brian Blum admits that he doesn't have a lot of experience driving in snow – and it showed when he tried to tough his way through an Israel storm a few years ago. The main Tel Aviv to Jerusalem road had been closed, but he thought he knew better. He took the "alternate route" to get home. "And then visibility reduced to about three inches. Or zero. And the drop from the very small pre-widened shoulder of the road went in one direction: straight down." You can read about the rest of Blum's harrowing trek online. [http://tinyurl.com/yapqvn]

Jerusalemite (and former Chicagoan) Joyce Schur says when snow hits, her city comes to a standstill. "People just want to stand around staring at it... [the] reason being because no one knows what to do with it! No one can figure out how to get it out of the way... There's also no such thing as ice scrapers or calcium chloride. The city's municipal workers rush to the Super-Sol and grab big blue boxes of kosher salt for de-icing streets like Herzl (I am not exaggerating)." [http://tinyurl.com/ygyh3e]

They're better prepared up north. The Golan's Mount Hermon, home of Israel's ski slope, is the only place that you might find snow throughout the winter. When it opened in 1969, mules were used to get up the hills. There are ski lifts now. Ski Hermon's Hebrew-only website has a couple of ski-cams, a virtual tour of the slopes and a snow-depth report. When I checked: 45 centimetres toward the base of the ski run and 70 centimetres at the top. [www.skihermon.co.il/]

With all the attention on Jerusalem and the Golan, can we ever expect to see a white Tel Aviv? Don't bet on it, says Ha'aretz. "The Mediterranean's temperature never drops below 12 degrees, even in extreme circumstances. Only an external cold wave could overcome the relatively warm winds from the sea – something that occurs once every 30 or 40 years. The elders of Tel Aviv remember (or perhaps not) the great snow of February 1950, which piled up to half a meter." [http://tinyurl.com/yjhvuz] Here are some photos from that rare storm, including a Tel Aviv palm tree in the snow. [http://tinyurl.com/yht8hc]

Although this winter's was a large storm, snow is nothing new to the Holy Land. Thousands of years ago, the prophets were also moved by its beauty. It was King David who said to God in Psalm 51:9, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." [http://tinyurl.com/yct3qd]. And we can only imagine what an ancient Jerusalem looked like when David was inspired to write these words, "He sends the snow like white wool; he scatters frost upon the ground like ashes." (Psalms 147:16) [http://tinyurl.com/y9z9gv]

Toronto-born poet inspired by life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto-born poet David Zaretsky, 86, is working on a legacy for his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Over the past 30 years, he has written almost 2,500 poems, many about relationships and feelings, and a volume about Israel.

He writes now for his family, so that they'll "always have a piece of me."

His poems, handwritten and indexed numerically in several black binders, include such titles as Am I to Blame for Loving You, The Ideal Mom, I Gave You My Word, and I Would Love You Just the Same.

His poems about Israel, such as Israel Belongs to Me, show his love for the country.

More than 300 of his poems have been self-published in a softcover volume called Poetry pure and simple.

Zaretsky, who has been divorced for about 20 years, left school at age 16 and for many years ran a variety store in Etobicoke.

David Zaretsky

He began his writing "career" as a songwriter, "but I couldn't get a break in the music industry. When my daughter read some of my lyrics, she suggested I do some readings," he says.

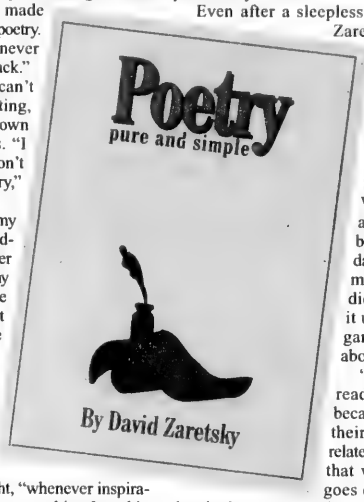
"I changed the songs a little, and they made beautiful poetry. I've never looked back."

He can't stop writing, and he's read over his own work about 500 times. "I enjoy it every time. I don't read anyone else's poetry," he says.

"Writing has saved my life. When my granddaughter died [in October 2005], I wrote to keep my mind busy. It helped me through a very difficult time. It brings me comfort."

Living alone, "my poetry and my children are my only interests. I have bad feet and bad eyes, but my mind keeps going," he says.

He writes day or night, "whenever inspiration hits. I'll write about something I read in a newspaper article, television program, or something I hear at shul."



He has even written about not being able to sleep:

"There has to be a better way,/ for me to fall asleep./ Then just to lie, alone in bed,/ and keep on, counting sheep./ There has to be someone who cares,/ enough to cuddle me./ To help me see it through the night,/ and compliment my dreams."

Even after a sleepless night, however, Zaretsky is up every morning at 5 a.m. to exercise, and he's at shul – he attends the Chabad Lubavitch congregation on Bathurst Street north of Wilson – for a 7 a.m. service. "I began to attend daily services after my granddaughter died, and I've kept it up. The [congregants] love to hear about my poetry.

"People like to read my poems because I write about their life. They can relate. They've told me that when something goes on in their lives, they look up a poem about it.

"Poetry is like good music, it's easy to hear and it's enjoyable."

Canadian funds diverted around Hamas government in Israel and the territories since 1993 – recognizes Israel, renounces terrorism and accepts previous agreements signed by the PA and Israel.

So far, Hamas has refused to meet these conditions.

Last week, in an interview with the Globe and Mail, Hamas Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar reiterated Hamas' rejection of Israel, and added that a Jewish homeland should be established in Canada.

Scott declined to say when the proposed Canadian aid will reach the Palestinians.

But despite Canada's boycott of the Hamas regime, Ottawa has dispatched to the Palestinians more than $20 million in humanitarian assistance since March.

"None of these funds have gone directly to Hamas," Scott said.

Last week, after MacKay met with Mahmoud Abbas, Ottawa announced a further $1.2-million contribution to build a border crossing between Israel and Gaza in order to facilitate trade.

Scott said that, because of Hamas's electoral victory, Canada has suspended three aid projects and not implemented another one in the Palestinian areas.

A project that called for annual meetings between the justice ministers of Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority was in the planning stages when it was abruptly ended.

The suspended projects would have provided English-language training to Palestinian security officials, rehabilitated housing, and refurbished an industrial park in the West Bank town of Ramallah, the current capital of the PA.

Winnipeg's Gray Academy marks Wallenberg Day with Africa program

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On Jan. 17, students grades 9 to 12 at the Gray Academy of Jewish Education in Winnipeg joined communities around the world in commemorating Raoul Wallenberg Day with a day-long program focusing on human rights abuses in sub-Saharan Africa.

. Joining the Jewish students at the school for the day were students from nearby Balmoral Hall, a non-Jewish private school, and Southeast Collegiate, an aboriginal boarding school in Winnipeg with which Gray Academy has had previous joint programs.

In total, about 200 students took part in the event.

"This program was inspired by [MP] Irwin Cotler when he spoke to our students a few years ago," says Shelley Faintuch, director of community relations for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, who, along with assistant Nora Sobel, did much of the organizational work.

"The goals of this conference were to bring awareness to students about human rights issues, and to empower students to undertake initiatives and action plans."

In 2001, Canada proclaimed Jan. 17 to be Raoul Wallenberg Day to remember the Swedish diplomat who is credited with saving more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust.

The Russians arrested him in Budapest on Jan. 17, 1945. He disappeared into the Soviet gulag and his fate is unknown.

The Gray Academy program began with an overview of the situation in sub-Saharan Africa by Hamdesa Tuso, a visiting professor of conflict resolution at the University of Winnipeg. Tuso, who is originally from Ethiopia, focused on the legacy in Africa of colonialism and on the effects of the Cold War and the rise of Islamism.

Following Tuso's introduction, students separated into different groups to hear about real-life experiences of human rights abuses from individuals living in Winnipeg who are originally from current and former African hot spots such as Sudan, Somalia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Congo.

After lunch, students gathered in the Berney Theatre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, where they viewed A Good Man in Hell, a documentary about Canadian general Romeo Dallaire and the Rwandan genocide in 1994. In the documentary, Dallaire issues a damning indictment of the United Nations and the world as a whole for doing nothing to stop the killing.

Judy Dueck of Human Rights Information and Documentation Systems then spoke to students about different interpretations of human rights and challenged them to take action on issues such as child labour in developing countries and the problems of aboriginal Canadians.

The students then divided themselves into four groups, each one charged with developing a plan of action. At the end of the day, each group presented its plan to the overall body.

Two groups proposed to tackle the situation in the Darfur region of in western Sudan, with one focusing on education, networking and getting information out through the media, and the other proposing fundraising projects and that petitions be sent to MPs.

Withheld report on Middle East trip raises questions

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As the Prime Minister's Office continues to withhold from the public a report written by a special advisor to the Middle East about his recent trip to the region, so does speculation that the report may not even exist.

The Mississauga-Streetsville MP Wajid Khan, who defected to the Conservative party from the Liberal party earlier this month, was named special adviser to the prime minister on Middle East and Central Asian affairs last summer.

In September, Khan went on an 18-day, $13,000 fact-finding mission to six countries in the Middle East – Saudi Arabia, Israel, Syria, Jordan, Egypt and Lebanon.

The Globe and Mail reported that he did not meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert or Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, but did arrange meetings with senior Israeli representatives and PA officials.

Since his return, his report has been withheld from the public by the Prime Minister's Office, and this has led to speculation that an official report may not have been filed.

"I'm not sure how much of a report it is. I suspect he probably shared some notes and observations from his trip," Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee said in an interview with The CJN.

"He met, while in Israel, with a number of people, mostly to learn from them about the situation from Israel's perspective. So I suspect that there isn't some kind of blue ribbon report that offers a comprehensive assessment of what Canada ought to be doing in the region. I imagine it is more of his personal reflections that he thought would be of some value to the government."

During a news conference last week, Liberal leader Stéphane Dion also questioned the existence of the report.

"I want to hear the prime minister say, 'I received a written report.' I want him to say, 'and then I will make it public.' And people will know what is in it and the speculation will stop."

The PMO's refusal to release the report has also led to speculation that it could contain recommendations that oppose the current Canadian government's stance on the Middle East.

In an article that appeared in a Palestinian newspaper, Al-Hayat al-Jadida, last fall, Khan expressed support for an initiative that calls on Israel to return to its pre-1967 borders, the Globe and Mail reported.

The Arab peace initiative, which was introduced by Saudi Arabia and adopted by the Arab summit in Beirut in 2002, calls for Israel's full withdrawal from the West Bank, Gaza, east Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, "the achievement of a just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem," and the establishment of a sovereign independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip with east Jerusalem as its capital.

In return, Arab countries would "consider the Arab-Israeli conflict ended, and enter into a peace agreement with Israel, and provide security for all the states of the region."

If Khan's report does include recommendations based on the Arab peace initiative, it would contradict statements Prime Minister Stephen Harper made last year to the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy that it was impractical to demand that Israel revert to pre-1967 borders.

But Fogel said it shouldn't matter if Khan's views differ from those of the prime minister.

Fogel said no government is monolithic, and it would be wrong to think that everyone in a particular caucus thinks along the same lines.

"I wouldn't consider it noteworthy if Wajid Khan's views were different than one or another or many within his old caucus or his new caucus, and I'm not at all concerned about there being a discrepancy between his observations and those that are held by the prime minister or anyone else in the cabinet."

Fogel added that he knows Khan's discussions with the Israelis were non-judgmental, that Khan appreciated the opportunity to gain more insight into the Middle East conflict, and that it had very little to do with changing Canadian foreign policy.

"It think it's a mistake for people to see this story as something of any substance or significance as it relates to Canadian foreign policy. It has way more to do with the domestic scene and the constant back and forth between partisan parties in a parliamentary democracy."

Harper is reportedly sending Khan on another fact-finding mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

אפרטהייד בישראל!

קראתי על ההתנפלות של ראשי הממסד היהודי האמריקני על הנשיא לשעבר ג'ימי קרטר אחרי שציין בספרו החדש ש"ישראל מקיימת מדיניות אפארטהייד בגדה המערבית". אחר כך קראתי את דבריה של השרה לשעבר שולמית אלוני באותו עניין. וכך בין השאר כתבת אלוני:

"הצדקנות היהודית כל כך מובנית בתוכנו, עד שלעולם אינו מוכנים ליטול קורה מבין עינינו. פשוט לא יכול להיות שיהודים, שהיום הקורבן האולטימטיבי, יעשו רע.....כאשר פלסטיני נסע על כביש שנועד "רק ליהודים", רכבו מוחרם והוא נשלח להסתלק מהשטח..."

"פעם, כשהיתי עדה למפגע כזה בין נסע לחייל שעצר, שאלתי את החייל , למה? הוא השיב: "זו פקודה, זה כביש רק ליהודים". שאלתי היכן יש שלט המעיד על כך ומדוע לנהג שלא לעלות על הכביש?" התשובה היתה נפלאה: "...מה אתּ רוצה, שנשים שלט האיזה עיתנטאי או צלם אנטישמי יצלם את השלט ויראה לכל העולם שיש אצלנו אפארטהיד?"

עד כאן שלמיזל אלוני. אבל כמו כל דבר בחיים-להביט על דברים תוך התעלמות מהקרטקטסט שלהם-באמת מתאים לשמאל הקיצוני. ישראל היא מדינה דמוקרטית שמתמודדת יום יום נגד טרור ערבי שפל, ששולח ילדים עם מטעני חבלה דרך מחסומי גבול. אין מדינה דמוקרטית יכולה להתמודד נגד שפלים שכאלה בדרכים דמוקרטיות, ואכן מפעם לפעם נראית ההתנהלות הישראלית כבוחנית מאוד. ראינו באושוויץ איך נראים יהודים עדיניים ויפי נפש שלא יכולים להגן על עצמם. בתמונה הנדולה-אם ישראל צריכה לבחור בין להיראות כמו באאושוויץ או באפרטהייד-עדיף אפרטהייד. יד על הלב- אין ישראלי אחד שאינו רוצה שהיחסים בינינו לבין הפלסטינאים יראו כמו בשוויץ. אך מה לעשות-עד שתהיה שוויץ במזרח התיכון, כל עוד שורמשים האלה מפוצצים אוטובוסים ומסעדות ישראליות-אני מעדיף קצת אפרטהייד על פני הרבה אאושוויץ. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Pan's Labyrinth

לדעת רבים-הסרט הטוב ביותר של השנה, שיצא לאקרנים לפני שבועות מספר. סיפור רב עוצמה ממיטה האחרונים של מלחמת האזרחים בספרד, אלא שבנוסף לממדים היחסית מוכרים של מלחמת אזרחים, מובא כאן סיפור אגדה מופלא על ילדה שנדלה בצל המלחמה, שמשתלב בסיפור הכללי בצורה מדהימה. גילרמו דל טורו, הבמאי המקסיקני, עשה את זה בגדול, כשהוא מרעיד את נשמתו של כל מי שיושב באולם. זהו סרט שאתם חייבים לעצמכם, ואפילו אם אתם אוהבי השיט הכי גדול בקולנוע-הסרט הזה יִנָּע בכם. עשר בסולם קורן.

Borat

מה לא אמרו כבר על סרטו של הקומיקאי הבריטי- יהודי סאשה כהן? שהוא מצחיק, ועושה צחוק מהאמריקנים אדומי הצוואר. סאשה כהן, בוראט העיתונאי -פרימיטיבסקי מקזחסטן- צוחק על כל העולם. אבל יד על הלב-אם בְּמקום להיות יהודי שיורד על קזחסטן הנידחת-היה קומיקאי נוצרי מציג בנסות כואת את, חס ושלום, ישראל - כמה זמן היה לוקח עד שדרשוביץ וחבר מרעיו היו תובעים אותו על אנטישמיות ורצח עם?

ואם במקום לצחוק על קזחסטן היה הוא מלגלג, נאמר, על איראן-כמה זמן היה הוא עוד מסתובב חפשי?

בקיצור-חכם על חלשים.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Total Joint Assessment Centre: A Partnership to Reduce Wait Times for Patients in Need of Total Hip or Knee Replacement

The Total Joint Assessment Centre is a hospital partnership developed to shorten wait times for total hip and knee replacement surgery by providing patients with an early consultation and a choice of surgical date options. Referrals to the Centre must be made by a physician or a family doctor. Care at the Centre is provided by an interdisciplinary team specializing in musculoskeletal health.

The Total Joint Assessment Centre, located at North York General Hospital's Branson Site, strives to schedule the earliest possible date for those needing surgery - within 26 weeks of their referral to the Centre. This period is consistent with the provincial access targets established by the Ontario government in December 2005 as well as pan-Canadian benchmarks. Expert and timely care can limit the progression and complications of osteoarthritis, and the resulting affects that may have on a person's overall health and quality of life.

Patients meeting the criteria for total joint replacement may choose either the first available surgeon from among the partner hospitals, a preferred surgeon from one of the three hospitals, or if they prefer, they may choose to wait until time is available with a surgeon at their preferred hospital.

The Total Joint Assessment Centre (TJAC) is an innovative project between Markham Stouffville Hospital, York Central Hospital and North York General Hospital. For more information on the TJAC, please visit the websites of any of the TJAC partners or call the Total Joint Assessment Centre at 416-635-2415.

Jewish leader saves 'white separatist' from protesters

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council protected self-proclaimed white separatist Jared Taylor, of Oakton, Va., from an angry mob, and he's sure Taylor had no idea that a Jew pulled him from the fire.

"I think I saved him from being killed by the mob," Jon Goldberg said, tongue-in-cheek, the day after the 55-year-old Taylor tried to address an audience at a Halifax hotel on the topic of racial diversity, integration and its role in North American life.

The protesters – who, along with journalists, were the only people at the Jan. 16 event – shouted Taylor down and prevented him from speaking. Two of them then physically shoved Taylor into a hallway, but Goldberg prevented them from manhandling him any further, the Halifax Chronicle Herald reported.

Goldberg wondered later if the anger and rowdyism was staged to set Taylor up as a martyr.

Many of the angry, obscenity-spewing protesters were masked by bandanas and balaclavas. The planned event was aborted by hotel security even before police arrived to break up the crowd.

"We had heard in December he was coming here," said Goldberg. "I was there to hear his message, find out how we could learn from it and be prepared to confront it. This guy is Ivy-League educated, was dressed in a suit and tie like a businessman, and I wanted to hear his angle."

Goldberg continued. "He was here legally. He hadn't broken any hate laws. But he'd probably die if he knew a Jew saved his neck."

Goldberg said he's familiar with Taylor's views, which he finds abhorrent, but he said the protesters were wrong to physically usher the speaker out of the meeting room.

"Unfortunately, unless he breaks [Canada's] hate-crime law, it's a free country," Goldberg told the Chronicle Herald after Taylor tried to speak.

What Taylor has done is "incite these people to violence, which will make him a martyr," Goldberg said. "The best thing you could have done was to ignore the guy."

Taylor, the editor of American Renaissance, which has been published since 1990, insists he's not a white supremacist, which he defines as a person who wishes to rule over others. He insists that he is instead a white separatist.

"My point is simply, people prefer the company of people like themselves." he says in his journal. "Please just leave us alone."

His Halifax appearance was originally promoted on Stormfront.org, which uses the slogan White Pride Worldwide, as a debate with David Divine, Dalhousie University's chair of black Canadian studies.

The Stormfront site was quoted as saying, "Hopefully people on the East Coast can spread the word to like-minded Canadian allies, resulting in a large following to attend and support our side of the debate. Eastern Canada should receive a good introduction to our philosophy. Please tell friends of this. … If we're lucky, Paul Fromm may attend."

(Fromm is a public supporter of notorious Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.)

Taylor said he was surprised to learn that the Jan. 15 debate with Divine was being promoted on Stormfront.org., stressing that he's not associated with the website.

"In fact, I am frequently criticized on that site," Taylor said

However, the day after news of Taylor's Dalhousie appearance broke in December, university president Tom Traves cancelled the debate.

"He had heard that Nazis were threatening to mob the event," Taylor said.

Divine stated on Dalhousie's behalf that the school is "a responsible institution and therefore we have to decide very carefully when we put on presentations that we do not unnecessarily cause offence and compound the difficulties of individuals and communities who have been systematically discriminated against over centuries."

He added: "Therefore, we will not provide a platform to individuals or organizations who espouse hate against particular groups."

Taylor was clearly upset about the cancellation of the Dalhousie debate, which was scheduled for Jan. 15, the birthday of U.S. civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.

Instead, he scheduled his lecture on racial diversity and the controversy surrounding the issue.

Divine was slated to hold a talk of his own on Jan. 15, but it was cancelled by a snowstorm.

"They've turned the debate into a monologue," Taylor said. "I'm astounded. It seems to me we're going to have a debate about diversity in which a diversity of views is not allowed."

In an interview with the Chronicle Herald, Taylor said he has never received such a "disconcerting" reception in his life. He said he was outraged by the behaviour of most protesters at the meeting.

"I kept expecting police officers to show up," Taylor said. "So it was a surprise to me that that never happened."

Brussels ceremony recalls couple who hid toddler

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Sylvia Karwaser was only two years old in 1942 when Alida Pontus and her husband, Charles, both non-Jews and getting on in years, saved the very young girl's life by sheltering her from the Nazis in their own home in Brussels for more than two years.

Yet according to Karwaser's daughter, Rachel Goodman-Aspler of Montreal, her mother, a longtime educator at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto whose married name is Sylvia Goodman and is now 66, still retains faint memories from that time.

Those recollections were stirred anew, Goodman-Aspler said, at a moving November ceremony in Brussels to bestow Yad Vashem's "Righteous Among the Nations" honour upon the couple, who are now deceased.

The honour was accepted at the Israeli Embassy in Brussels by the Pontuses' granddaughter, Denise Salmona, and great-granddaughter, Alise. Also in attendance were Goodman-Aspler, her mother, sister Ayala, Yad Vashem officials, and Israeli ambassador Jehudi Kinar.

"It took a long time, because we never knew the Pontuses' first names," Goodman-Aspler said in an interview. "We had had the family name and addresses, but nothing else. [Alida Pontus] was always referred to as 'bonne maman.'"

The ceremony was the culmination of a dogged effort by Goodman-Aspler and others dating back more than a decade to have Yad Vashem give the Pontuses' their due.

But the application could not be properly completed until all the pertinent information – including the Pontuses' first names and at least one person to corroborate what they did – could be supplied to Yad Vashem. Sylvia was too young to really remember or vouch for the couple that saved her.

"I'm here today because of that family," Goodman-Aspler said. "They deserved to be recognized."

In 1942 Brussels, two years after the Nazis occupied Belgium, Sylvia Karwaser was living in an apartment building with her parents, Srul and Chaya (Goodman-Aspler's grandparents). The Pontuses were the Karwasers' landlords, but they lived in another building, and when the situation started to become much worse for Brussels' Jews, the couple offered to take Sylvia in.

Initially, Sylvia's parents hesitated to say yes because of the Pontuses' ages, but they acquiesced when it became clear how dire the situation was.

Within days after Sylvia came to live with the Pontuses, her parents were transported to a transit camp called Caserne Dossin in Malines between Antwerp and Brussels. The vast majority of Belgian Jews sent to Caserne Dossin wound up in Auschwitz, but because of the couple's young ages and ability to work, they lived a full two years there until being liberated by the Allies in 1944.

Also, because the Nazi occupation of Belgium was a bit less severe than elsewhere, Goodman-Aspler said, her grandfather, who worked with leather at the camp, was allowed to briefly go into Brussels, where he visited with his daughter surreptitiously. The visit proved so troubling to little Sylvia, though, that it was decided not to do it again.

After liberation, the family was reunited and they stayed in touch with the Pontuses until their deaths in 1951 and 1952. Sylvia and her parents moved to Toronto in 1953.

Twelve years ago, Goodman-Aspler, herself a veteran of the March of the Living and a psychologist who treats Holocaust survivors and their families, began the effort to get the couple recognized by Yad Vashem.

However, efforts to find out the Pontuses' first names though contacts with the Jewish Museum in Belgium, Yad Vashem and the Internet bore little fruit.

Then, about two years ago, a cousin of Goodman-Aspler's in the United States, Michal Freedman, who is on the staff of Massachusetts Democratic Congressman Edward Markey, made a personal request to the Belgian embassy for help.

That led to the discovery of a 1942 document listing all the residents of an address in Brussels that included the Pontuses' first names, Alida and Charles.

Incredibly, Goodman-Aspler said, Sylvia Karwaser was among the names listed as living with the Pontuses.

As for someone who could corroborate that the Pontuses had housed Sylvia, that came from Andrée Geulen, a woman credited with saving the lives of more than 1,000 Belgian Jewish children during the war.

"My mother's situation became known to her, and she checked up on her personally," Goodman-Aspler said. "She also had her name in one of four black books she carried with her."

In her speech at the ceremony in Brussels, Goodman-Aspler noted that when her daughter was born in 2002, she was named Nediva, which is Hebrew for "noble," or "generous," in honour of the Pontuses. It was only after finding out the name of Alida Pontus that the family discovered that the names meant the very same thing.

"If it wasn't for their selfless behaviour, we would most likely not be part of this world," Goodman-Aspler said in Brussels.

"In this way, the Pontus family and our family will always be intertwined."

Winnipeg school program honours Wallenberg

The third group of students suggested adopting an African school or village and raising money to buy a sewing machine or medical supplies, or to build a classroom.

The fourth group talked about keeping the public aware of the three Israeli soldiers who are being held captive by Hamas and Hezbollah. The students suggested writing letters to the new United Nations secretary general, as well as to Canadian political leaders and newspapers.

Raoul Wallenberg Day continued in the evening, when Hillel/JSA (Jewish Students Association) and the University of Manitoba Student Union, among other sponsors, presented Stephen Lewis, former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations and UN special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, as a guest speaker at the University of Manitoba.

Other tributes to Wallenberg were also held in Montreal, Vancouver, New York, Stockholm, Paris, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Berlin, Caracas, Montevideo and Santiago.

In Buenos Aires, some 100 people – including Holocaust survivors, foreign dignitaries, local politicians, Jewish leaders and members of the local Islamic centre – gathered Jan. 17 near a sculpture of Wallenberg to honour the Swedish diplomat.

"The Shoah is not just the tragedy of the Jewish people," Rabbi Sergio Bergman said. "It's the tragedy of humanity, and until every human being understands this, Wallenberg's efforts won't be complete."

Winnipeg back to one kosher butcher shop

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the closing of its rival in late December, Omnitsky Kosher Food is once again this city's only kosher butcher shop.

The competitor, Hali Kosher Meats, was opened by the Odwak family at the beginning of September, about six weeks after Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir removed its hechsher from Omnitsky.

The vaad action's were the culmination of a long-standing dispute between Omnitsky and the vaad over the latter's efforts to raise the level of kashrut in Winnipeg. The Odwaks, who have been non-kosher butchers for several decades, reached an agreement with the vaad to open Hali Kosher Meats as a kosher butcher shop inside their existing store.

The agreement stipulated that Hali would be allowed to operate at its location in the family butcher shop for up to three months to test the market.

After that time, if the Odwak family was satisfied with the level of business, brother and sister Harry and Lisa Odwak – who were operating Hali – would look for an independent location for the new butcher shop.

The Odwaks declined to comment on why they decided to close Hali.

Sam Gekht, the owner of Omnitsky, which regained its hechsher in the fall, was unavailable for comment.

Longtime Vaad Ha'ir president Don Aronovitch would only say that the meat industry is difficult even for non-kosher butchers.

But he added that as a result of changes made over the past few months, the standards of the vaad's hechsher, the WK, are now the highest they've ever been.

For years, the WK hechsher was not recognized by most Orthodox consumers in North America (as well as many Orthodox consumers in Winnipeg).

But for the past 10 years, the vaad has been trying to raise the standard of the WK to make it acceptable nationally and internationally.

Standards of vaad's hechsher are highest they have ever been

The WK's problems date back to the mid-1980s. Traditionally, kashrut had been supervised by a panel of three Orthodox rabbis, but in the mid-1980s, the community split over the creation of an eruv, with two teaching rabbis in favour of creating the Shabbat boundary and two pulpit rabbis opposed.

When the eruv was created over the latters' objections, they declared their colleagues to be in violation of Shabbat and hence not to be followed in matters of Jewish law. When one of the teaching rabbis was elected to the kashrut panel, the shul rabbis declared that the WK was no longer a valid hechsher.

Later, the WK's problems were compounded when the vaad could no longer muster three Orthodox rabbis to monitor kashrut. One Orthodox rabbi remained as the city's only kosher supervisor, but he led a congregation that had voted to adopt mixed seating, leaving his credentials in question for some people.

In 1996, the community asked Justice Roy Matas to investigate the problems of kashrut in Winnipeg and recommend steps to remedy the situation.

When Aronovitch became the vaad's president in 2000, he set out to raise the standard of kashrut in the city.

Now, under the leadership of a new kashrut administrator, Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, who came to Winnipeg last summer from Ottawa, the vaad is making a concerted effort to convince all of its 125 licensees to follow with new standards.

"Our kashrut is now accepted by Orthodox consumers throughout North America as on par with OU, COR, MK and other major hechshers," Aronovitch said. "We have the seal of approval from well respected Rabbis David Jenkins from New Jersey and Zushe Blech from Manhattan. They have opened doors for us throughout North America."

One catch for local consumers, however, has been that the price of kosher meat is noticeably higher now than it was before.

That's because when it revoked Omnitsky's certification, the vaad also laid off the community's two longtime shoichets. As a result, Omnitsky has to bring in all its fresh meat from the east. (Some supermarkets and specialty also carry packaged frozen kosher meat.)

The vaad did promise Gekht that it would look into hiring a new shoichet, but it said there is no news on that front.

Quebecers asked to debate where society going

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The debate that has been heating up over how far Quebec should adapt to religious and cultural practices that are at odds with the majority's customs and values is expected to receive a thorough airing during a series of province-wide meetings over the next three months.

All Quebecers are being invited to offer their views on "reasonable accommodation" and where their society is going at a forum organized by the Institut du Nouveau Monde (INM). The independent think tank, which describes itself as non-partisan, was founded two years ago with the aim of stimulating discussion about the province's future.

The forum will also look at such related issues as the integration of immigrants, the place of religion in public spaces and the future of the French language, as well as relations with native people, the influence of new technologies and globalization, and the growing divide between the Montreal area and the rest of the province.

Dubbed "The Strategic Rendez-Vous on Culture," the theme is "What is Quebec Culture Becoming? What do We Want it to Become?"

Simultaneous regional meetings will be held Feb. 2 to 3 and March 16 to 17 in nine locations throughout the province, culminating in a final gathering April 27 to 28 in Montreal, with the participation of academics and other experts.

Ira Robinson, a Concordia University Judaic studies professor and member of Federation CJA's board of directors, sits on the forum's steering committee.

At the end, recommendations for action are to be made to government and other decision-makers.

"The Quebec landscape has become very diversified over the past decades, making way for emerging cultures. Do we see this as a sign of enrichment or dissipation of Quebec culture? Should we seek the consolidation of a common culture or develop the co-habitation of a mosaic of cultures and identities?" the forum's co-chairs, Gerard Bouchard, a sociologist and historian at the Université du Québec à Chicoutimi, and Céline Saint-Pierre, à Université du Québec a Montréal sociologist and past president of Quebec's Superior Council on Education, ask in the introduction of the forum's program.

The INM's executive director, Le Devoir columnist Michel Venne, adds: "You are invited to leave your taboos and preconceptions aside and give way to your hopes for the Quebec of tomorrow."

Le Devoir will devote a special section to the forum's themes Jan. 20.

Robinson said he was invited to join the steering committee by Bouchard, with whom he first collaborated several years ago in the organization of a conference on relations between Jewish and French Quebecers, held at Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom.

The "reasonable accommodation" debate (a phrase borrowed from the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms) has dominated the French media in particular for months. Radio-Canada, for example, just completed a week-long series on television, radio and its website about the issue.

The tone has been that change is taking place too rapidly, that Quebec's identity is being compromised, and that immigrants and minorities have a responsibility to adapt. In December, the Action Democratique Party said it would place limits on reasonable accommodation if it came to power.

While the debate has encompassed such questions as Muslims' wearing of the hijab and Sikhs carrying the kirpan (a ceremonial dagger) in public schools, some believe that chassidim have lately been receiving disproportionate focus in this discussion.

In recent months, stories about the YMCA frosting its women's gym windows at the request of chassidic neighbours; about female police officers being advised to let their male colleagues deal with male chassidim; about the legality of some chassidic schools; and about chassidim jumping the queue at a health centre to be treated before Shabbat have received prominent play.

Sometimes the insinuations of having to bend over backward to meet Jewish demands have no foundation. Many media reported that Montreal City Hall adjourned a crucial debate on the budget Dec. 15 because it was a Friday night and the first day of Chanukah.

In fact, Mayor Gerald Tremblay had to catch a flight to Paris.

"This is an issue that needs to be addressed in a thoughtful, systematic way," said Robinson. He believes it's important that all Quebecers, wherever they live, feel a part of this dialogue and that the forum is providing that opportunity.

He thinks the chassidim, who have lived here for 60 years or more, are getting so much attention now simply because there are more of them, perhaps 10,000 in Montreal and north of the city.

"They have newly come into the consciousness of people in way they did not before, just because of their sheer numbers. Another thing is their insularity. This touches a nerve and expresses itself in different ways."

They are also the most identifiable of Jews for most Quebecers, he said. "The other tens of thousands of Jews are not noticed."

In the rest of North America and western Europe, a similar debate, especially since 9/11, has focused on Muslims. In Quebec, for reasons not entirely clear to Robinson, Jews have become "an important element in the discussion on 'otherness'," alongside Muslims.

Hackers bring down neo-Nazi website

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A neo-Nazi website that praised Adolf Hitler and attacked an alleged Jewish "takeover of the most important social institutions of Canada" has been taken down by unknown hackers.

The site belonging to the National Socialist Party of Canada was hosted on a U.S.-based server (computer) but was created by two Canadians, said Michael Ettedgui, education associate with Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto.

The centre brought the site to the attention of police in Ontario and Saskatchewan, asking that they investigate the "registrant," a resident of Barrie, Ontario, and the "contact person," who lives in Regina. The centre believed the site violated Canada's hate laws, said Leo Adler, Canadian director of national affairs for the centre.

"This site was particularly disturbing because it surfaced around the time the Iranian president [Mahmoud Ahmadinejad] and others had stepped up their Holocaust denial campaigns. We view its dismantling as a victory in the fight against Internet hatred in this country," Adler said.

Ettedgui said the centre played no role in bringing down the site, but since it was shut down, "there's been a lot of chatter on white supremacist forums, and the neo-Nazi and white supremacist community is talking about it."

The site was created in July 2006 and last updated in October. The listed administrative organization was "Third Reich History." The primary goal of the organization, set out on the site's home page, was to "restore our country to the sons and daughters of Europe."

It promoted a platform that called for the reversal of multiculturalism, an end to Jewish influence on Canadian institutions, "restoring white sovereignty in Canada," and building up the "white birth rate."

Adler said there is precedent for charging someone in Canada for content of a website that is hosted abroad, noting that the Canadian Human Rights Commission ordered London, Ont., resident Tomasz Winnicki to stop contributing to a website located outside Canada and he was jailed for violating that order.

AQUATIC TRAINING WITH PROVEN RESULTS

BAYVIEW GLEN DAY CAMP

Start your child on a childhood of summers created just for them...

Every child is different: some enjoy the arts, some enjoy sports and others enjoy a variety of enriched activities. Bayview Glen Day Camp has created unforgettable memories for thousands of boys and girls since 1962, as one of Toronto's longest-running most comprehensive day camps.

The Camp offers ten, age-specific units ranging from enriched balanced programs for our youngest campers to activity electives as they grow and their tastes broaden. Enhancing the variety, campers can also participate in 1-4 night camping adventures or BVG Sports, new for 2007. With focussed one-week sessions developing baseball, ice hockey, tennis or soccer skills, BVG Sports exemplifies how Bayview Glen Day Camp constantly reinvents itself to make each child's summer experience fresh – and personal.

Other innovative examples include the popular Munchkinland (12-24 months), a Staff-In-Training program allowing teens after Grade 8 to earn a Leadership Certificate. The camp also integrates a rewarding Sunshine Program for children with special needs.

Centrally located on the secure, leafy campus of Bayview Glen school – the Camp enjoys two on-site pools for daily Red-Cross Swimming, sports fields and acres of park land; a theatre, climbing wall, computer labs, art studios, gyms and more, all air-conditioned and ready for any weather.

Add the hand-picked staff of 350 experienced counsellors to ensure an exceptional ratio of staff-to-campers; it's no wonder that readers of City Parent voted Bayview Glen Day Camp Best Co-Ed Day Camp.

Camp Timberlane celebrates 50 years

Camp Timberlane, one of the original Jewish summer camps in Ontario, is gearing up to celebrate its 50th anniversary.

Founded by Barry and Philomena Lowes in 1957, the camp, located on Lake of Two Islands in the Haliburton Highlands, was purchased in 2006 by Corey Mandell, owner of Mandell Entertainment, who has been associated with the camp for 28 years.

"I came to camp as a camper at age nine, and was on staff for eight years.

Two years ago, the Lowes approached me about becoming director, and the following year I was given the opportunity to purchase it. That summer camp was my first love, but I never dreamed I would become owner," says Mandell.

To celebrate the camp's anniversary, he says, they have begun reaching out to the community to find the almost 20,000 alumni now living around the world, in order to invite them to two camp reunions being held this spring and summer. The first reunion, for those who cannot make it up to camp, will be help Saturday, May 12 at the Capitol Event Theatre.

"It will feature entertainment and multi-media presentations, and will be an opportunity for alumni to schmooze and reunite with other alumni they may not have seen in years.

"Most of all, however, the reunion will give the almost 650 alumni a chance to pay tribute to Barry and Phil Lowes," says Mandell.

The second reunion is being held at camp the week-end of Aug. 18 and 19, he says. "This week-end will give everyone the chance to come back and experience camp again.

"It will feature camp activities, special programs, campfires, singsongs and a social. Space is limited to 400 guests."

In addition to regular camp activities, including water and land sports, arts and crafts, and dance, for the past two years, there have been a number of new developments at camp including a new skateboard and rollerblade park, an outdoor in-line hockey rink, and an indoor movie theatre.

As well, they have renovated at least one-third of the cabins, and have upgraded the waterfront.

Mandell says they have also begun construction of an alumni village, which will give families a chance to come up while camp is in full swing and enjoy activities. "This will give kids a chance to see how camp is run, and hopefully want to come and be campers," he says.

New campers, he says, now have the opportunity of attending a new week-end program, or a five-day program. "We want campers to feel comfortable about coming to camp."

Camp Timberlane is mainly, but not exclusively Jewish, he says, and Friday evening they hold a Shabbat service and dinner.

For information call Mandell at 416-733-7200, ext. 224 or check out the website at www.camptimberlane.ca.

The time has come to renew relationships and share stories as we gather together to celebrate the 50th year of Camp Timberlane. Two exciting events are planned with more details to follow.

Saturday May 12th, 2007 - TORONTO

50th Anniversary Celebration Party

The first event will take place at The Capitol Event Theatre. It will be an evening to shmooze and reunite with other Timberlane alumni featuring various entertainment and multimedia presentations. Most of all, it will be a tribute to Barry and Phil Lowes. 650 tickets will be available for this event.

August 18th and 19th 2007 - HALIBURTON

Back to Camp Reunion Weekend

The second event will take place at Camp Timberlane. It will be similar to our 40th, a chance for everyone to come back and experience camp again. The weekend will feature all of our camp activities, special programs, campfires, sing songs and more. Space will be limited to 400 guests.

Camp Kadimah – Generations of Memories

A Jewish identity is a great gift. Jewish Camping creates the possibility for building Jewish leaders through peer to peer education, lasting friendships and fun, informal Judaic programming that kids remember and cherish for a lifetime.

Camp Kadimah is entering its 64th summer on the beautiful shores of Lake William, two hours outside of Halifax, Nova Scotia. We offer a wide range of activities for children ages 7-16 including arts and crafts, land sports, water-ski and wake-boarding, sailing, canoe and kayak, Red Cross and National Lifesaving instructional swim, drama, Israeli song and dance, and scouting. As a proud member of Canadian Young Judaea, our program team and schlichim from Israel ensures fun Zionist content to inspire a knowledge and love of Israel in our campers.

At Kadimah, we take a holistic approach to programming, exposing campers to a full range of programming, including a four day camp wide Maccabia colour war, camping trips to National and Provincial parks, and local sites, theme days, a hockey marathon, and softball, basketball and volleyball house leagues. Optional sport teams, art projects, camping trips, boating races, nature programs with ecologists from nearby universities are some of the ways that campers can involve themselves further in camp life.

Younger campers enjoy a range of special programming including outings to the Atlantic Ocean, local farms, a camp carnival and theme days. Our Machar program, for our oldest campers 14-15 year olds, is designed to be challenging and fun, addressing Israeli culture and politics, as well as Jewish ethics.

Our Counselor In Training (CIT) program gives 16 year olds the chance to experience working on different types of programming throughout camp, working with campers in cabins, and leadership training. The CIT program incorporates volunteer opportunities with local camps and towns to encourage leadership and tzedakah. A 5 day trip in Atlantic Canada promotes CITs learning about local culture, small Jewish Communities, and visit beautiful Atlantic Canada.

Camp Kadimah is a place where generations have danced and sung the same songs. A place of first loves, first accomplishments, and standing ovations. It is a place where kids can feel a part of a community of peers, and be given a chance to shine at what they do best.

URJ Camp George: Blending the Best of Ontario Camping with the Best of Jewish Camping

Situated on the beautiful shores of Maple Lake, two hours north of Toronto, Camp George is one of 13 residential camps in North America owned and operated by the Union for Reform Judaism. Camp George – co-educational, for campers currently in Grades 2-10 – blends the best of Ontario camping with the best of Jewish camping.

Singing songs around the campfire … Getting up on waterskiis for the first time … Paddling a canoe through a local park … Reaching the top of the climbing wall at the ropes course … Overnight camping provides both the opportunities and the nurturing environment that fosters the personal, social and physical development of campers and staff. Overnight camp fosters independence, builds self-esteem, enhances one's appreciation of the natural surroundings, and enables one to develop important individual and team physical and social skills.

The overall goal of the Union for Reform Judaism camping system is the development of a knowledgeable and Jewishly literate community for the future. Through the years, URJ Camps such as Camp George have helped thousands of campers and staff achieve development goals while also being effective complements to spiritual and congregational life, religious school, youth activities, and teacher education. Camp George provides positive frameworks within which Judaism is celebrated, compelling communities are built, and leadership and commitment is developed.

Activity Highlights Include: waterskiing, sailing, canoeing, kayaking, swimming, outward bound, mountain bikes, ropes, two climbing walls, a giant swing, tennis, soccer, basketball, softball, beach volleyball, ultimate frisbee, drama, arts and crafts, dance, pottery, photography, and more!

Camp George builds Jewish identity through a wide range of experiences, integrating educational opportunities into the fun of everyday camp activities.

* Jewish values guide programming
* Spirituality is fostered by daily prayer
* Folk songs, modern popular Israeli songs, and Hebrew songs can be heard both as part of a rousing song session in the dining hall as well as on the pathway to activities.
* Hebrew words and expressions find their way into daily discourse
* Shabbat is celebrated – a highlight!

… And the support and caring of a community that eats, sleeps, learns, competes, and plays together - creating powerful lifelong friendships and bonds.

Camp George offers two 3½ week sessions each summer, with approximately 300 campers and 120 staff in attendance each session. Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 28 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The girls & pre-school camp is located at 475 Patricia at Eitz Chaim Schools. The boys camp is located at their Spring Farm Campus. They offer modern air-conditioned facilities for their indoor activities.

A big hit in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

New dating site offers more ways to meet your match

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Yoav Cohen, co-founder and CEO of JLove, the newest online Jewish dating service, guarantees that finding your bashert is just a matter of following six simple steps.

"If you follow the six steps of love, from our experience and based on some polls that we did with our members, you will find love," said Cohen, 42, who is originally from Kfar Saba, Israel, and divides his time between Los Angeles and Toronto.

Cohen, a former employee of Spark Network, a provider of online personals that introduced JDate in 1997, said JLove serves as an alternative to JDate because of the different features it offers.

According to JLove's "Six Steps to Finding Romance," a list that is e-mailed to members, each member should complete a profile that includes a picture and characteristics of what they want in a mate.

JLove also suggests that each member complete a personality assessment test to help find a match.

Its JType personality profiling system allows members to use their assessment results to search for other members that they're compatible with.

"From the pool of JType members, we would provide you with information about those who are similar and complimentary," said Kyle Gordon, JLove's director of communications.

The next step in finding your soul mate is to e-mail other members.

JLove also suggests that members make themselves available by visiting the site often, or by downloading Instant JLove, an instant messaging tool used to communicate in real-time.

"It's kind of like MSN [instant messenger]. It will also tell you if you've received an e-mail from a member or if a member has contacted you so you don't have to be on Jlove.com to receive one," Gordon said.

Cohen said that people who are truly serious about finding love have a better chance of doing so with JLove.

"I believe that within the six billion people [in the world], everyone has a soulmate out there. If you're proactive and you decide that you want to meet someone, it's like a full-time job," he said.

Jlove success story: Ruchel G. of New Jersey, left, and Bram K. from Israel began their relationship via email and daily telephone calls, but after meeting in England it took only days for Bram to propose to her. The couple plans to marry in Israel.

Since JLove launched last June 2006, Cohen said, it has signed up about 50,000 Jewish, heterosexual singles from countries all over the world – including New Zealand, the Netherlands, England, Australia, Israel and of course, the United States and Canada.

"The beauty of the Internet is that it isn't like a Matzah Ball party, where you see 3,000 people but you really don't know who you're going to click with. But with the Internet, you can actually narrow down what you like. If you like tall, blond hair, blue eyes, Orthodox, moderate, left-wing, right-wing – the Internet helps you eliminate traits that you don't like and cut to the chase," Cohen said.

In addition to the personality assessment test and the instant messenging tool, Cohen said, JLove is the only Jewish dating site to offer online gift certificates, which allow recipients to read and respond to e-mails, send instant messages and chat in real-time.

Jlove offers three packages: one month costs $29.95, a three-month package costs $69.95 and a five-month package costs $99.95.

Another venerable Jewish dating site takes a different approach.

Israel Alouf, president and CEO of JMatch, which evolved out of Jewish Quality Singles (JQS) – a service founded by his mother, Devora Alouf, in 1989 – said that while most sites let people sign up and create a profile for free, Jmatch also allows people to reply for free.

"There are a lot of other services where even if someone has paid and has sent another member an e-mail, that other person receiving it can't open it unless they paid as well. We're against this policy," Alouf said.

"Essentially, on the other systems, you're sending them an invoice. That's not the best icebreaker. You're basically saying, 'Pay this amount if you want to read my message.' Not very romantic," he said with a laugh.

Jmatch's main focus is on members who are serious about finding a life partner, he said.

"We are much more marriage-oriented, as opposed to dating. You can fall in and out of love and you can have 20 dates a week. But what we're about is creating a lasting relationship. We're about matchmaking with someone for a lifetime," he said, adding that his organization has also partnered with The CJN to operate CJN Dating.

Alouf said his staff monitors the information that members provide in their profiles and will contact them directly if they feel it can be improved.

"We're not only a website, we are also a matchmaking network. Our matchmakers are constantly interacting with users, giving them advice, and helping them create a better profile."

As part of an effort to modernize the 10-year-old site, Alouf said, members can expect a new look for Jmatch.com by the end of February.

"We're going to… have an easier navigation system, as well as a member dashboard, which is going to be completely new. When members log in, they will have a dashboard showing the most relevant information. Basically, all their data will be in one central location so it'll be even easier to navigate the website."

Another site that is jointly sponsored by JQS, Jmatch and members of the Jewish community is Jewish Singles with Special Needs (JSWSN).

"It's a completely free service for any member of the Jewish community who has any kind of disability or is just shy or apprehensive about the dating scene and wants to have a more accepting environment," Alouf said.

"It's a smaller community and it's very refreshing that it's the only site of its kind. We have people who are visually impaired, hearing impaired, terror victims from Israel. It's a very uplifting project that's helping people everyday."

Cohen, who doesn't consider other Jewish dating sites to be his competition, believes in the mission of all the services that aim to bring Jewish singles together.

"We really believe in our culture and our way of living. Judaism isn't necessarily all about religion or going to synagogue. The culture is about the way we live, the way we have our Shabbat dinner, the way we believe in education and we like to preserve all this. We're trying to help young singles who really want to meet someone Jewish and preserve the Jewish culture," Cohen said.

Toronto student spends year volunteering in Poland

By AVIVA MILLSTONE

I grew up hearing the word "kehillah" – the Hebrew word for community – quite often in the Toronto Jewish community. They were, and still are, important words that permeate my life. In the past several months, I have learned a new word – a word that has been infused into my new vocabulary and into my new life outside of Canada.

That word is gmina, the Polish word for community. I've learned that word since I began working for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee ("The Joint," as it is called in Poland) as a Jewish Service Corps volunteer placed in Warsaw, Poland, for one year.

Last year, nearing the end of my university career, I felt it was time to learn about Jewish communities beyond Israel and North America. I knew there were other communities in the world in which I could make a contribution.

Since I was accepted as a JDC volunteer in September, I have been living in Warsaw. I have gotten involved in the local community, their programs, and their families. Each day I am amazed at what can be done here and how I, as a proud Canadian Jew, can help Jews in need overseas.

The work that I do involves initiatives to unite communities and bridge generation gaps, all within the framework provided here by JDC.

My volunteer position is housed within the Jewish Social Welfare Commission, which is one aspect of JDC's work in Poland.

In addition to projects I organize with the Youth and Education Department, I also work with senior citizens through the welfare commission by creating educational and cultural programs for them, attending retreats with them, listening to them and helping them to live out their lives in dignity.

The welfare commission assists more than 1,000 seniors in seven Jewish communities throughout Poland. It also assists more than 60 families in need.

The seniors and families receive medical care, home care, medicine, food and the attention of volunteers who help enrich their lives. Volunteers are trained and comfortable with what they are doing, and they enjoy their work.

In addition to the work I do in Warsaw, I have had some opportunities to travel to different communities around Poland. Recently, I helped organize a project that highlighted the best of Jewish life in Poland.

As a way to show our appreciation for more than 50 volunteers, the Volunteer Centre organized a Mitzvah Week.

In seven Polish communities – Gdansk, Katowice, Szczecin, Lodz, Wroclaw, Krakow and Warsaw – there is a social worker from the welfare commission as well as numerous volunteers.

Together, we planned a program specifically tailored for each community. The goals were to thank and show appreciation to our volunteers, to create a program that welcomes and includes members and leaders of the community and to give people the opportunity to participate in a special event rooted in Jewish values of doing good for others, working together and taking care of each other.

The planning, advertising and co-ordination of the week kept me on my toes – especially when you consider the language barrier. (I'm working on my Polish.)

But in the end, I helped create a program that included special diplomas, gifts and material to enhance the volunteers' experience in each community.

In Wroclaw, there was a kiddush after shul on Shabbat, during which the rabbi spoke and the social worker made a presentation to members of the community.

In Krakow, the social worker organized an evening in the Senior Club, and many people came and filled the room with happiness. The social worker gave the volunteers their gifts and diplomas and read a story about mitzvot. The rabbi in Krakow addressed the volunteers and emphasized the importance of their work.

Gdansk has a small community, yet despite that, the warmth and energy I felt when I was there was incredible. For the program there, a special Shabbat dinner was organized.

The social worker presented members of the community with gifts and diplomas, and I gave a speech about doing mitzvot and how appreciated the volunteers' work is.

The last Mitzvah Week event took place in Warsaw. More than 60 people, young and old, gathered together. The Youth Club kids sang songs in Hebrew and Polish and a musical presentation by students from the Lauder Morasha Day School followed.

It was incredible that so many people of different ages who do different things in the community came together to do mitzvot and help each other.

The time I have spent in Poland has filled me with many feelings and thoughts. I am so thankful and appreciative that I have the opportunity to work with the Jewish communities in Poland.

The work that is being done here is not easy, and elsewhere in the world, having events like the ones I described may be taken for granted. But not here.

I am so proud and amazed at how the communities came together and how they make an effort to support each other. There is Jewish life here, not just the past that haunts people, but there is a present and a future for the Jews in Poland.

I am hopeful these communities will grow and change. Every community and every person has a story and a past, and here in Poland their stories and their past have motivated and inspired people to create a present and a future.

Aviva Millstone of Toronto is living and volunteering in Poland for one year.

The almond tree – the herald of spring in Israel

In China, it represents enduring sadness and female beauty; for Muslims, it's a mark of heavenly hope, and in India, its fruit is believed to be a sacred "brain" food and aphrodisiac. In modern Israel, however, the almond tree is more than symbolic: almond trees are the first to bloom after the long, dark winter, and they are enthusiastically welcomed as heralds of spring.

In late January or early February – but always in time for the Tu b'Shvat (the New Year of the trees) festival that falls on the 15th of the Hebrew month of Shvat – Israel's thousands of almond trees wind their roots down toward water, stretch their branches up toward the brightening sun and, seemingly overnight, cover Israel's still-wintry landscape with their sweet-smelling pink and white blossoms.

The sight of these delicate flowers floating on leafless branches across Israel's hills and valleys has been an unmistakable part of the landscape of the Land of Israel since the days of the Bible. The almond was considered a superior fruit as far back as biblical times, and the almond blossom was the model for the Temple menorah. In the biblical description, the menorah's cups are described as mishukadim – almond-shaped.

Jacob urged his sons to include almonds in the offerings they were taking to Joseph in Egypt, in order to win favour in their powerful brother's eyes, and Aaron's staff sprouted, blossomed and produced almonds (a process that usually takes about five months), proving to the people of Israel that he and the house of Levi had been chosen by God as His priests.

Meaning "to be wakeful" or "to hasten," the almond's Hebrew name, shaked, recognizes the tree's hurry to awaken from its winter slumber – it's the first tree in Israel to blossom each year and the last to be harvested.

Plant researchers believe that today's almond trees evolved from an ancient deciduous plant in Mongolia, the prunus dulcis. Closely related to the cherry, peach and plum, the almond's kernel is thought to have once been inedibly bitter. Centuries of selective growing in the warm climates of southeast Europe and southwest Asia, however, have given almonds their characteristic sweet, spicy crunchiness.

Some bitter varieties (usually with pink blossom) are cultivated, though the sweet (usually with white blossom) are more popular by far. Their kernels are eaten fresh, dried or roasted, used in baking and pressed into fine medicinal oils. The bitter varieties contain prussic acid, a poison that must be processed out before almond flavouring is made.

The most nutrient-dense of all tree nuts, almonds have been popular in Europe and the Middle East for centuries. Entirely cholesterol- free, one ounce of almonds (about 23) contains 160 calories, but only 1 gram of saturated fat, along with vitamin E, magnesium and potassium. Lauded for its versatility, its buttery flavour and its crunch, it is known as "the gourmet nut," and is eaten salted or toasted, as a prime ingredient in candy, pies and cakes, or as almond butter, almond extract, almond flour and almond paste.

The confection marzipan consists primarily of ground almonds and sugar, though it is unclear who first discovered the recipe. One tradition has it coming from the Orient, where it was served at the Sultan's table to crown the meal. Another has it produced in Italy, when almonds were the sole substantial crop to survive a major drought and people learned new ways to utilize them. Wherever it began, sugar cane cultivation in the New World gave marzipan production a major boost.

This luxury candy has also become an unusual art form. Tinted and moulded, it can be shaped into edible sculptures. In Kfar Tavor in Israel's Lower Galilee, a marzipan museum includes a life-size marzipan Elvis, as well as marzipan heads of politicians David Ben-Gurion, Shimon Peres and others, a family barbecue and Jerusalem's outdoor Machane Yehuda market. Visitors can view a short film on the production of marzipan, participate in a marzipan workshop, tour the unusual art gallery and treat themselves to a sweet experience in the store.

Unlike marzipan, pure almond has a variety of health benefits. The almond's cholesterol-free fatty acids are said to reduce the risk of heart disease, and its concentration of vitamin E to reduce both inflammation and the accumulation of plaque in the arteries. Almond oils are used today in aromatherapy, in cosmetic creams to soften the skin, and to help relieve irritation, inflammation and itching.

The almond tree was brought to California from Spain in the mid-1700s by Franciscan monks. Perfect Mediterranean conditions helped the almond industry take firm root, and California now produces some 70 per cent of the world's almond crop.

But the traditions of the almond live on in the lands where they grew in antiquity. Every kindergarten child in Israel welcomes the start of spring by singing: "The almond tree is blossoming, the sun is shining."

And each year, Israelis are uplifted as the landscape turns into a mass of pink and white blossoms.

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Excitement is building as six contestants in the First Annual Simply Manischewitz Cook-Off have now been selected to compete in the finals, which will be held in New York on Feb. 1. This is this first-ever Jewish cooking competition open to the public.

Three semi-final events were held in the northeastern, southeastern and western United States. Ten contestants in each area, selected from thousands of entrants, had one hour to prepare and serve their original recipes, each using at least one Manischewitz product and containing no more than nine ingredients. The grand prize winner will take home a $20,000 (US) package.

As one of the judges in the western competition held on Dec. 14 at the Hilton Hotel in Costa Mesa, Calif., I sampled all the entries (have I told you lately how much I love this job?) and voted with my peers on taste, appearance, ease of preparation and originality.

"We have the highest level of kashrut happening here," said David Rossi, Manischewitz vice-president of marketing. All ingredients, utensils and equipment were provided to the contestants under strict rabbinical supervision, including koshered GE ranges.

The semi-final winners were Michaela Rosenthal of Woodland Hills, Calif., with her Whitefish and Potato Knish and Andrea Bloom of Long Beach, Calif., with her Pea and Fennel Soup. Other entries included Curried Potato Puffs, Farfel-Almond Cookies, Simcha Sweet Potato Soup, Herb Chicken Schnitzel, Spinach Patties, Matzo-Males (chicken tamales using matzah meal instead of corn meal), Zesty Mexi Chicken and Matzo Ball Soup, and Gefilte Fish Stew.

First up was Rosenthal's Whitefish and Potato Knish, a tender, flaky appetizer with a hint of seafood, swimming fin to eye with oniony potatoes. Ready-to-use products such as instant mashed potatoes, canned French fried onions and frozen puff pastry make this one a snap to prepare. The Creamy Horseradish Sauce with Lemon is the perfect topper.

"Right after Passover last spring, I was making potato knishes for a cocktail party when I noticed some leftover gefilte fish in the fridge," Rosenthal said. "I thought, why not throw it in," and a winning recipe was born.

Rosenthal, who collects vintage barware and martini glasses – she has over 700 martini glasses in her collection – is married to an attorney and has two children, Allison, 26, and Kyle, 19. "I was surprised that I won," she said. "I had trouble writing it down, because I've made these knishes so often and the recipe was in my head."

Bloom's Pea and Fennel Soup was one of three soups entered and got high marks from the judges. Its bold green color and fresh, vibrant taste make this soup a standout. "I love working with fennel," Bloom said. "I made it this year for Passover instead of matzah ball soup, and it was a hit with my family."

Bloom, 36, is single and works as a headhunter for KFORCE Technology Staffing in Gardena, Calif. "I was pretty confident about the recipe," she said, "and thought it would win. Now I have to go back to work!"

WHITEFISH AND POTATO KNISH

From Michaela Rosenthal, Woodland Hills, Calif.

⅔ cup instant mashed potatoes
⅔ cup boiling water
4 tbsp. (½ stick) unsalted butter, melted
1 can French fried onions
¼ cup chopped flat-leaf parsley, plus more for garnish
1 jar Manischewitz All Whitefish, drained and patted dry
salt and pepper, to taste
1 box frozen puff pastry, defrosted
2 tsp. Manischewitz Fish Seasoning
8 tsp. Manischewitz Creamy Horseradish Sauce with Lemon

Preheat the oven to 375. Line a large, rimless cookie sheet with parchment paper or grease with butter. Place instant potatoes in a medium bowl. Add boiling water and stir to combine.

Measure 2 tsp. of the melted butter and set aside. Add remaining butter to potatoes and mix well. Stir in fried onions and parsley.

Mash fish and add to potato mixture. Add salt and pepper to taste. Mix well. Remove both pieces of puff pastry onto a floured board. Unfold and cut along natural folds to form 6 equal rectangles. Remove 2 rectangles for another use. With a floured rolling pin, roll remaining 4 rectangles slightly to flatten.

Spoon ¼ of potato-fish mixture onto each of the 4 rectangles and level to within ½ in. of the edges. Fold edges of dough and roll each piece into a log (like a jelly roll). Pinch seam lightly to seal. Trim unfilled dough ends. Place logs seam side down on a baking sheet and brush with reserved melted butter. Sprinkle with Fish Seasoning. Using a serrated knife, cut each log into 8 equal pieces and place them ½ in. apart. Bake until golden brown, 30 to 35 minutes.

To serve, arrange knishes on a serving platter. Garnish each piece with ¼ tsp. of the horseradish sauce. Sprinkle with parsley. Yields 32 pieces as an appetizer.

PEA AND FENNEL SOUP

From Andrea Bloom, Long Beach, Calif.

3 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup diced celery
1 cup diced white potato
1 leek (white part only) diced
1 fennel bulb (fronds removed), diced (save thin slices for garnish)
2 lb. frozen or fresh peas
salt and pepper, to taste
2 cans Manischewitz chicken broth
⅓ cup (packed) light brown sugar

In a 10-quart stockpot, heat 2 tbsp. of the olive oil over medium-high heat. Add celery, potato, leek and fennel and sauté, stirring often, until soft, 3 to 5 minutes.

Add peas, season with salt and pepper, and continue sautéing for 3 minutes.

Add chicken broth, brown sugar and 2 cups water. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, until vegetables are soft, 20 to 25 minutes. Puree the soup in batches in a blender. Season with salt and pepper.

When ready to serve, stir in remaining olive oil. Garnish with fennel slices. Makes 6 to 8 servings

Don't let him slip through the payment net

Family Matters

Question. My husband moved to the U.S. to remarry, leaving me with custody of our two children. Ever since, he has paid me child support based on his U.S. net income.

I know he is required to pay on gross income, but is he also required to convert his U.S. gross income to Canadian gross income and use that amount to calculate support payments on the Canadian Child Support Guidelines chart?

My children and I have remained residents of Ontario. Also, is any of the unpaid support payment due retroactively?

Answer. Yes, he has been underpaying because he must pay based on gross income — not his net income — retroactive to the day he started underpaying, converted to Canadian currency.

Moreover, since U.S. tax rates are less than Canadian tax rates, the Child Support Guidelines demand that his U.S. income be "grossed-up" or recalculated to reflect the difference between the two tax rates so that he will be paying the same in child support as if he lived in Ontario.

You need to see a family law lawyer and accountant to calculate the amount of the gross-up in his income. To enforce the amount not paid, have the Ontario Director of the Family Responsibility Office (free of charge) enforce your agreement or court order in the state where he resides.

They can suspend his driver's license or even incarcerate him. If your deal is only in the form of a written agreement you will first have to file it with your local Ontario Court of Justice under a prescribed court form and fill out a statement of arrears from the FRO Director.

Make sure you indicate that you want his U.S. income "grossed-up" to account for the difference in tax rates.

Question. I will be cashing $100,000 in RRSPs to split with my separated wife but will pay $30,000 in withholding tax. Any help here?

Answer. Yes. You both sign a separation agreement and a special form to transfer the RRSP to her tax-free in a "spousal rollover" and file it with the CRA.

Question. I was wondering if you could help me. My fiancé and I live in B.C. and we are going to be getting married in Nova Scotia. Is our marriage license valid if we get married in a province other than the one we live in now?

Answer. Yes. But in the winter it is much colder in Nova Scotia and it snows more in Halifax than it does in Victoria. Nonetheless, I understand that the people are very friendly.

Tu b'Shvat – the New Year of the trees

By NORENE GILLETZ

On the 15th of Shvat on the Jewish calendar, six weeks after Chanukah, we celebrate Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the trees. This year, Tu b'Shvat falls on Friday, Feb. 2. It is customary to increase the amount of fruits and nuts we eat, particularly those associated with Israel. We should try to eat at least one fruit that we have not eaten that entire season.

I have several friends who celebrate a Tu b'Shvat seder, although I've never attended one. For excellent information on how to make a seder, visit www.aish.com/holidays/Tu_BShvat/Articles. It is somewhat similar to a Passover seder and involves enjoying the following foods:

- the seven species for which the land of Israel is praised: figs, dates, pomegranates, olives, grapes or raisins, wheat and barley (in the form of bread, cake or cereal);
- various nuts with inedible shells (walnuts, almonds, pistachios, coconut) and fruits with inedible peels (oranges, pomegranates, avocado);
- fruits with inedible pits (dates, olives, peaches, plums, cherries;
- fruits with edible seeds (blueberries or strawberries);
- wine or grape juice, both white and red.

A tzedakah box is also part of the seder.

Since Tu b'Shvat falls on Shabbat this year, it would be appropriate to incorporate the seder into one of the Shabbat meals, using challah as the bread – or you can serve blueberry buns for dessert (see recipe below). The suggested order of eating the fruits is: olives, dates, grapes, figs, pomegranates.

It is traditional to drink four cups of wine:

First cup – pure white
Second cup – pale pink (white with a drop of red wine)
Third cup – (darker pink)
Fourth cup – almost totally red (with only a drop of white)

For your Tu b'Shvat dinner, why not enjoy the following recipes from Matthew Goodman's cookbook, Jewish Food: The World at Table (HarperCollins). It's an outstanding book, packed with intriguing lore and luscious recipes from around the globe, including wonderful recipes from the lesser known, more exotic cookery of the Jews of Yemen, Bukhara, Baghdad and Israel, among others. Enjoy the following dishes that are a small sample of Goodman's marvelous recipe collection. Eat in good health!

CHICKEN IN POMEGRANATE SAUCE WITH WALNUTS AND FIGS

Culinarily, the best way of using pomegranates may be with pomegranate molasses, a fixture in the cookery of Jews from Syria, Iran and Iraq. A thick, brown syrup, pomegranate molasses has a tangily sour taste with a slight undertone of sweetness. It's used to flavour the sweet-and-sour dishes prominent in the cuisine of the region in much the same way as tamarind concentrate, though pomegranate molasses is more pleasing, fruitier and less powerfully acerbic.

Perhaps the most well known of the dishes using pomegranate molasses is in the Iranian pomegranate and walnut sauce called fesenjan. It is most commonly made with duck, though it can also be made with chicken, quail or even meatballs. In Goodman's adaptation of fesenjan he's added fresh figs (like pomegranates, one of the seven fruits celebrated in Tu b'Shvat), whose lush sweetness helps to balance the astringency of the pomegranate molasses. If you can't find fresh figs, you can use dried instead. Pomegranate molasses can be purchased at most Middle Eastern groceries.

1 chicken, 3 to 4 pounds, cut into 8 pieces; or 4 split breasts, totaling about 3 pounds salt
freshly ground black pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
1 cup finely chopped walnuts
2 cups chicken stock
12 fresh figs, quartered (or substitute dried figs)
1/3 cup pomegranate molasses
2 tbsp. honey

Rinse the chicken pieces and pat them dry. Season them with salt and pepper.

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Add the chicken and cook until browned on all sides. Remove and drain on paper towels.

Lower the heat to medium, then add the onion to the pan and cook, stirring often, until soft and translucent. Lower the heat to medium-low and add the walnuts. Cook, stirring regularly, until they have just begun to change colour, about 3 minutes.

Add the chicken stock, figs, pomegranate molasses and honey and mix well. Cover and bring to a boil. Lower the heat and simmer, covered, for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Return the chicken to the pan and simmer, uncovered, until cooked through, about 35 minutes. Transfer the chicken to a large serving platter and pour the sauce over it. Serve hot. Serves 4.

TORONTO BLUEBERRY BUNS (SHTRIZLACH)

Blueberry buns are to Jewish Toronto what, say, smoked meat is to Jewish Montreal – one of those rare foods that manage to be at once vitally important to a specific community and almost unknown outside of it. It's not easy to come up with an analogy to describe blueberry buns. They are not injected with a glob of filling, as are jelly doughnuts. Rather, the dough is first rolled out, the blueberry filling is poured on top, and the dough is folded over and pinched closed. The dough itself is yeasty and light, a bit like that of a Danish pastry, though less rich. On the other hand, it's far richer than that of a traditional bun, and the crust is egg washed and sugary.

For the filling:

1 1/2 cups fresh or thawed frozen blueberries
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch dissolved in 1/4 cup water
1/4 tsp. salt

For the dough:

1 package (about 2 1/2 tbsp. active dry yeast)
1/2 cup warm water
1/3 cup sugar
3 cups unbleached all-purpose flour, sifted
1 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. vegetable shortening
2 eggs
1 egg lightly beaten with 1 tbsp. water for egg wash
sugar for sprinkling

Make the filling: combine all the ingredients in a medium saucepan over medium heat and bring to a boil. Lower the heat and simmer, uncovered, for 5 minutes, stirring occasionally, until the mixture thickens to a jelly-like consistency. Remove from heat and let cool.

Make the dough: In a small bowl, combine the yeast and warm water with 1/2 tsp. of the sugar. Let stand until the mixture begins to bubble, about 5 minutes.

Combine the flour, the remaining sugar and the salt in the bowl of a standing electric mixer. Mix briefly to combine. Add the shortening, the yeast mixture and the eggs, and beat to form a soft dough that pulls away from the sides of the bowl. On a lightly floured surface, knead the dough just until smooth, about 2 minutes. Divide the dough in half and roll into 2 balls. Cover the balls with a towel and let stand at room temperature for 45 minutes.

Make the blueberry buns: Set out a bowl of cold water. On a lightly floured surface, roll out each dough ball into a 12x10-inch rectangle. Cut the rectangles into quarters (cutting first crosswise and then lengthwise), creating 4 pieces, each 6 inches by 5 inches. Place a heaping tablespoon of the filling in the centre of each piece. Moisten the edges of the dough with water, fold the short end of the dough over (creating a 3x5-inch bun), and pinch the edges tightly closed.

Preheat the oven to 375. Grease 2 baking sheets or line them with parchment paper. Place the buns on the prepared sheets and cover them with towels. Let stand for 30 minutes. Brush the buns with the egg wash and sprinkle the tops with sugar. Bake until browned, about 15 minutes. Transfer to wire cooling racks. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 8.

Peretz addresses Herzliya Conference

'Israel is fighting against terror, not the Palestinian people'

By AVI ISSACHAROF
©Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Amir Peretz warned Monday that Israel's overtures to the Palestinians are meaningless in the face of the abuse inflicted by a settler on her neighbours in Hebron.

Referring to footage of such abuse recently aired on television, Peretz told the annual Herzliya Conference that "Israel is fighting against terror, not against the Palestinian people," adding that he has instructed that travel restrictions in the West Bank are to be eased.

"I have taken significant measures that include less strict searches at roadblocks and the opening of additional terminals. It has an impact on the sense of co-operation. We have changed our search policy at roadblocks. But it all dwarfs in comparison to footage of a settler who curses and humiliates a Palestinian family," Peretz said at the conference.

He said the conduct of Hebron settler Yifat Alkobi is "a disgrace to our moral codes as a state, and such footage serves the interests of anti-Israeli incitement.

"The government has established a panel that includes the foreign minister and the minister of public security, which I am heading. This panel understands that it is impossible to explain to the world that the soldier seen in the background [who witnessed the abuse] is legally helpless. Around the world, this [incident] is perceived as an act performed under the auspices of the [Israeli] regime, and I do not intend to allow these phenomena to continue taking place," Peretz said.

At the conference, the defence minister also presented a diplomatic plan.

"It is clear that a new diplomatic plan must be put in place, because the standstill is working against us," Peretz said. He said he intends to bring before the government a three-stage plan that he devised.

The first stage includes a comprehensive ceasefire, an agreement for trading prisoners, co-ordination between Israeli and Palestinian security forces and the removal of illegal outposts established by Israel after March 2001.

At the second stage, Israel will launch negotiations with the Palestinian president on a permanent agreement. These talks will last approximately six months, and at their conclusion, an international conference will present their achievements. This stage will also include the transfer of territory defined as Area B (currently inhabited by Palestinians but under Israeli military control) to full Palestinian control, reopening the international airport in the Gaza Strip, and allowing travel between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank under certain restrictions.

The third stage, expected to last at least 18 months, will include detailed negotiations on the permanent peace accord.

Peretz's comments came a day after the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) admitted Sunday that the 44 dirt obstacles it said had been removed from around West Bank villages did not actually exist at the time.

Last Tuesday, the IDF announced that it had removed 44 dirt obstacles that blocked access roads to West Bank villages, to fulfil promises made by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during their meeting a month ago.

A military source admitted Sunday, however, that these obstacles "had either been removed before the political level decided on the alleviations or had been bypassed by Palestinians earlier and a decision had been made not to rebuild them."

This statement confirms a claim made recently by United Nations organizations operating in the territories: that most of these barriers had not existed for months.

The IDF has erected close to 400 such dirt obstacles in recent years.

Yemenite Jews flee homes after threats by Muslims

By YOAV STERN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Some 45 Jews of Sa'ada County in Yemen left their homes after being threatened by radical Muslims, the Saudi daily Al Wattan reported on Monday.

According to the report, the extremists told the Jews to leave their homes within 10 days, after which time they would be exposed to abductions and looting.

The Jews moved into a hotel in the town of Sa'ada, north of the Yemenite capital Sana. A formal complaint was submitted to the Yemenite President Abdullah Salah, the report said.

The threat – attributed to disciples of Shiite-inclined religious leader Hossein Bader a-Din al-Khouty – said that the Jews are acting in a manner that "primarily serves global Zionism, which is acting persistently to disseminate decay amongst the people and to cut them off from their principles, values, their morals and religion."

Formal complaint submitted to country's president

The message also said that the threat is based on surveillance of the Jews and that "Islam calls upon us to fight against the disseminators of decay."

Israel Radio on Monday interviewed a recently arrived immigrant from Yemen, who identified himself only as Masoud, who managed to contact one of the women forced out of their homes.

The man was told that the Jewish community received letters last Friday, saying that "whoever remains at his home will be killed or his children will be taken away."

According to Masoud, the Jews who fled their homes told him that "their condition has worsened, they are staying in a hotel, and they are scared." He said that the members of the Jewish community are not interested in immigrating to Israel, and wish to keep living in Yemen.

They blame their strife on the oblivious Yemenite government, which refuses to offer them assistance. The Jewish community, say its members, does not have efficient communication channels with the regime.

The Jews under threat contacted local authorities and demanded fair treatment as ordinary Yemenite citizens, saying that Islam imposes taxes on Jews in return for protection and security.

The Al Watan report also said that last week four masked men approached Yehie Moussa Merhavi, a member of the Jewish community, to stress that they would act on the threat. Merhavi said he was told that if the Jews do not leave their homes in two days, "they will only have themselves to blame" for the consequences, which would include abductions and looting.

Following the incident, the community was forced to evacuate the homes in which they lived for generations and leave their hometown, which is under the protection of tolerant local sheiks.

"We have been taken out of our homes. Our money is lost. We cannot provide for our children. We came to the county's capital to plead before the president and the government to treat us fairly, because we are Yemenites," Merhavi told Al Watan.

The Jewish community in Yemen consists of several hundred members. They maintain a community life, including a cheder for children's Torah instruction and pray regularly.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 2. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2007 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 16, 2007. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 23, 2007.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 1, 2007. Have fun and good luck.

Ashkenazi backed for IDF chief

As a former Air Force chief, Halutz was widely seen as incompetent when it came to managing a large-scale ground campaign.

Halutz, 58, had resisted earlier calls to resign – even after two other Israeli generals who had commanded troops in southern Lebanon quit – saying he did not bear all the responsibility for the handling of the war.

Once out of uniform, he could have damning revelations to make about the government's handling of the war when he appears before the official commission of inquiry. Known as the Winograd Committee, the commission is expected to deliver its interim findings as early as next month.

Strong criticism of Olmert and Peretz could be enough to tear apart the governing coalition of their respective Kadima and Labor parties. Opposition factions from across the political spectrum were unanimous last week in demanding early elections.

Meanwhile, one of the three candidates for the post of Israel Defence Forces chief, the current deputy chief of staff, Moshe Kaplinsky, announced Sunday night in a letter to Peretz that he had decided to pull out from the race.

Kaplinsky cited his wish to put an end to the "media circus" surrounding the matter of the appointment. At the same time, however, Kaplinsky expressed muted criticism of Peretz's decision to rush the appointment of a chief of staff prior to the release of the Winograd Committee's interim report on its investigation of the Lebanon war.

"The Winograd Committee was also set up to examine, among other things, my conduct during the war. The committee is still busy with its work and no one knows what its conclusions will be regarding my role, authority and influence on the war or the way I conducted myself during the war," Kaplinsky wrote to Peretz.

Late last week, Kaplinsky had concluded that his chances of receiving the appointment were few.

"I believe that I have the experience, the capability and the [moral] authority to carry out the function of the chief of staff in the best way possible… however, the IDF is a people's army… and therefore it is my view that the appointment of chief of staff must enjoy the widest possible consensus," he wrote.

"Since you decided, according to media reports, to appoint a chief of staff in the coming days and not wait for the full examination of the facts relevant to the war, I feel that it would be inappropriate for me to take on the role, at this time, and therefore request to withdraw my candidacy," he added.

On Monday, Olmert asked Kaplinsky, to stay on in the army following the anticipated appointment of Ashkenazi, in order to help rebuild the armed forces.

It's still unclear whether Kaplinsky would stay on as deputy chief of staff.

Sources close to Kaplinsky said last week that he intended to retire if he was not made IDF chief. In his letter to Peretz, however, Kaplinsky offered his experience and capabilities for as long as they were needed.

Peretz began considering the appointment of Ashkenazi as the next chief of staff soon after the end of the war in Lebanon last August. Last week, following Halutz's resignation, Peretz began promoting the idea of Ashkenazi as his replacement.

Peretz held a series of consultations that ended Sunday with a meeting with former cabinet minister Dan Meridor, who headed a committee examining Israel's security doctrine.

Peretz's office announced Sunday night that he had reached a decision, and that he intended to inform Olmert and the other candidates for the position, Kaplinsky and Gen. Benny Gantz. Peretz reportedly decided on Ashkenazi without consulting the prime minister.

Olmert told Channel 1 News on Sunday night that he had still not made up his mind who the next chief of staff would be. He also told the cabinet during its weekly Sunday meeting that the selection process for a new chief of staff would be as quick as possible and undertaken in co-ordination with Peretz.

Olmert also commended Halutz for his leadership, fighting spirit and excellence.

Most members of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee agreed yesterday that the new army head should not be an officer who was involved in the recent Lebanon war. In closed deliberations, the committee members did not name their choice for chief of staff, but they agreed that there should be consensus on the matter.

Israel Briefs

Israel lost war: minister

An Israeli cabinet minister said Israel lost last year's Lebanon war. "I think that this war, and I said this throughout the war, was a war we must not lose. And we lost this war, and the implications of this loss are evident today," National Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a retired general and former defence minister, told Israel Radio on Jan. 18. He was referring to widespread assessments that Hezbollah, merely for surviving Israel's 34-day offensive, had been bolstered in the eyes of its Arab and Iranian supporters. Ben-Eliezer also praised last week's resignation of Israel's military chief, Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz. "I said that the person who headed the military and who failed must take responsibility and get up and go," he said. But Ben-Eliezer, who is considered close to Defence Minister Amir Peretz, declined to say whether he thinks Peretz and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert should also step down.

Pilots to get IDs

Israel plans to require pilots on all incoming commercial aircraft to use a locally designed anti-terror identification device. Danny Shenar, chief of security for Israel's transportation ministry, said that between May and December, the government will issue a system called Code Positive to all pilots who plan to fly commuter aircraft into the Jewish state. Designed by the Israeli firm Elbit, it uses classified technology to verify that a plane is being flown by its authorized pilot rather than a hijacker. Shenar said the system aims to prevent a Sept. 11-style attack on Israeli soil and is "bluff proof." It will be issued free of charge.

Israel in Francophonie?

More than 50 French politicians, intellectuals and religious figures backed Israel's admission into the International Organization of Francophone Countries. "It constitutes an anomaly" that the Jewish state is not included, "given that 20 per cent of Israelis speak French," the CRIF umbrella organization of secular French Jews said in an ad placed in major French newspapers. It wasn't clear on what data CRIF based its numbers. The measure's backers included Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and presidential candidates Nicolas Sarkozy and Segolene Royal. Various groups have been trying for years to get the Francophonie to add Israel. The group has 55 states including Canada, Greece and former French colonies in Africa and Asia.

Hospital gets big gift

A California doctor donated $5 million (US) to Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek hospital. Norman Levan gave the funds for a centre for humanistic medicine, the hospital announced. Levan, 90, is a practising dermatologist in Bakersfield.

Jordan seeks nuclear power

Jordan is seeking a peaceful nuclear program. King Abdullah II revealed his country's plans in an interview last week in Ha'aretz. Abdullah said he had long opposed any nuclear capacity in the region, including Israel's. His mind changed recently, however, because Iran's determination to forge ahead with a nuclear program that experts say is aimed at manufacturing weapons has spurred Arab nations to consider their own nuclear programs. He cited Egypt and Iran's Persian Gulf neighbours. "The rules governing the nuclear issue have changed in the entire region," he said. "We want to make sure this is used for energy. What we don't want is an arms race."

Settlement plan iced

Israel froze plans for a new West Bank settlement. Israel said last month it was reviving decades-old plans to establish Maskiot, a settlement in the Jordan Valley, in order to house Israelis evacuated from Gaza in 2005. But on Jan. 19, Defence Minister Amir Peretz froze the plans. The decision came days after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice toured the region in an effort to revive the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. The announcement of the new settlement last month drew widespread criticism at a time when the international community is seeking to bolster relative moderates among the Palestinians.

Jewish Agency sponsors coexistence programs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For the first time in its history, the Jewish Agency is supporting a set of programs designed to promote Jewish-Arab coexistence in Israel.

The Jewish Agency, founded in 1923 to serve the Jewish community in pre-state Palestine, is working in league with the Abraham Fund, a non-profit organization dedicated to advancing co-operation between Israel's Jewish and Arab citizens.

Starting in February, the Jewish Agency will throw its support behind a path-breaking Abraham Fund program known as Language as a Cultural Bridge.

Originally devised to teach conversational Arabic and the values of tolerance to some 4,500 fifth and sixth grade Jewish students, the program will be expanded to accommodate a total of 8,500 students.

In addition, the Abraham Fund and the Jewish Agency are jointly developing encounter groups so that Jewish and Arab students can meet at sports and cultural events taking place at Jewish and Arab elementary schools in Israel's mixed cities and regions.

Ami Nahshon

Ami Nahshon, the New York-based president and chief executive officer of the Abraham Fund, described these collaborative efforts as "a historic new partnership."

The Jewish Agency's involvement represents a "sea change" in its agenda. As he put it, "It was created to build up the Jewish homeland, but a strong Israel requires investments not only in the Jewish sector, but in the Arab sector as well."

Nahshon said its decision to expand the scope of its mandate was made during Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah last summer.

As Hezbollah bombarded towns and cities in the Galilee, the Jewish Agency offered emergency relief to Jewish residents affected by the fighting.

No such help was extended to Israeli Arabs, who form a majority of the population in the Galilee and generally regard themselves as second-class citizens.

"The Jewish Agency understood that it was not right to ignore the needs of those Israelis," said Nahshon.

But as the war raged, the Jewish Agency joined forces with the Abraham Fund – which was founded in 1989 and named after the common ancestor of both Jews and Arabs – to send thousands of Jewish and Arab children to common summer camps.

Their shared experiences prompted the Jewish Agency to conclude that "there was value in bringing Arab and Jewish kids together," said Nahshon.

As a result, the Jewish Agency asked the Abraham Fund to draw up plans for Jewish-Arab encounter groups and decided to be part of the Arabic-language program.

"I absolutely welcome the involvement of the Jewish Agency," said Nahshon. "There is a major mindset shift underway here."

Jewish Agency chair Ze'ev Bielski is committed to these programs, he added.

When Bielski announced the expansion of the language program, he did so in the presence of Jewish and Arab mayors, teachers and officials from the ministry of education.

In a press release, Amnon Be'eri-Sulitzeanu, executive director of the Israeli chapter of the Abraham Fund, said that Jewish Agency participation marks "a milestone in the advancement of the vision of a shared society in Israel."

Nahshon expressed the hope that Arab-language instruction lessons will eventually be mandatory for all Jewish students in Israel, from kindergarten on to Grade 12.

"But this is a tremendous beginning," he noted. "We believe we're at the start of long and robust partnership with the Jewish Agency."

Nahshon said that the United Jewish Communities – an umbrella organization representing local federations in the United States and Canada – backs the fresh initiatives, despite "a flurry of opposition from some individuals and organizations."

He was not surprised by the dissenting views. "A big change like this naturally stimulates debate."

Coexistence programs are direly needed in Israel, where the Arab minority constitutes about 20 per cent of the overall population, he observed.

"Israeli Arabs experience significant gaps in all dimensions of employment, education and public services. The vast majority of Israeli Arabs see themselves treated as second-class citizens, though Israeli law does not differentiate between Jews and Arabs. There has not been adequate attention paid to the needs of Israeli Arabs."

In closing, he issued a warning.

"Societies that don't manage majority-minority relations end up in conflict. The Israeli government must do a better job in addressing these issues. Various [Israeli] governments in the past have paid too little attention to this."

Tafelmusik performs at Holy Blossom

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Award-winning and internationally renowned violinist Jeanne Lamon is celebrating her 25th anniversary as the music director of Tafelmusik this year.

The famed baroque orchestra and chamber choir has thrived under Lamon's direction over the last quarter century, and it's been quite the ride, she says.

"When I was invited to come and direct Tafelmusik, it was just starting out," she recalls.

"Today, we're a big family with a strong core of musicians. There is high gratification and high morale in the group."

Lamon learned to play the violin at age seven while growing up in Larchmont, N.Y.

She majored in music at Brandeis University and then headed to Europe to study.

"I studied in Amsterdam with a great teacher, Sigiswald Kuijken, and then I came back to Boston, where I freelanced and played chamber music," she says.

"For the next eight years, I honed my skills."

With her baroque violin in tow, Lamon travelled across the northeastern United States, playing in and directing groups.

When the living-out-of-a-suitcase lifestyle ran its course and Lamon had the chance to cross the border and have a real home base, she didn't hesitate.

"To move to Toronto and build this new orchestra was exactly what I wanted to do," she says.

She notes the orchestra developed its family-like structure in part because of its unique makeup, with Lamon simultaneously directing Tafelmusik while being an active member of the group.

"I lead from my position as first violinist, which is very different from an orchestra that is conducted," she says.

"Our rehearsals feel like a holiday meal with everyone participating fully."

Jeanne Lamon (forefront) and with the Tafelmusik Group (below).

The orchestra hit a high note in 1990, when Sony Music signed it to a recording contract.

Lamon and company responded by producing CDs prolifically.

"We were making five to seven CDs a year, which is a lot considering the average pop group puts out one or two," she says.

"It was a huge opportunity for us to be put on the world stage."

To date, some 75 CDs have been recorded by the group.

Concerts have been performed all over the world, including in Vienna, London and Jerusalem.

Lamon's leadership and passion has garnered her several prestigious awards. She has been named as a member of the Order of Canada, and received a Musician of the Year Award in 1999 from the Toronto Musicians' Association and the Joan Chalmers Award for creativity and excellence in the arts.

Lamon stresses that she always views these awards as prizes she shares with Tafelmusik.

"I accept awards on behalf of the group because I see them as awards for Talemusik, not myself," she says.

Although she has 25 years under her belt, Lamon is still committed to taking Tafelmusik to new heights.

The ensemble is now involved in music education, with the establishment of the Tafelmusik Baroque Learning Centre and the Tafelmusik Baroque Summer Institute at the University of Toronto.

"The new education program at U of T has the potential to grow and become something all-consuming," she says.

"It's definitely got a big future."

Tafelmusik will be performing at Holy Blossom Temple on Jan. 28. For tickets, call 416-789-3291, ext. 224.

Nassau offers gambling, great weather, sandy beaches

If you're looking for a three-day, four-day or one-week getaway with gambling and great weather, there is always Las Vegas, but if you are looking for gambling, great weather and beautiful sandy beaches, then Nassau/Paradise Island in the Islands of The Bahamas will be more to your liking.

WestJet Vacations is making it a lot easier for travellers to get to the Bahamian capital of Nassau, with three weekly flights offered by WestJet. For those looking for a package, there are a number of hotels and resorts with varying prices available, including the grandiose Atlantis, Paradise Island, with its 2,900 rooms and suites; a casino; 35 restaurants, bars and lounges; 20 million gallons of fresh and saltwater pools and lagoons; waterfalls; an outdoor marine habitat; and The Dig, a maze of underwater tunnels where visitors can see the ruins of a lost city.

If you wish to stay in Nassau, close to duty-free shopping, casinos, golf, tennis and many attractions, the historic Colonial Hilton Nassau is ideal. Boasting 291 rooms and suites, this hotel has the only private beach in downtown Nassau. The property sits on land that in 1695 was occupied by Fort Nassau. After an 1837 fire, barracks were erected and operated until Henry Flagler, a wealthy businessman, built a hotel in 1898. A fire swept the property in 1922, and a new hotel sprang up the next year. Canadian Sir Harry Oakes purchased the hotel in 1939, renaming it the British Colonial Hotel. It is now owned and operated by the British Colonial Development Company.

With your casino wins, you can partake in a plethora of fun things to do, including souvenir shopping at the Straw Market; snorkelling; deep sea fishing; visiting the Dolphin Encounters, where you can interact or swim with these friendly creatures of the sea; and seeing the Ardastra Gardens Zoo & Conservation Centre, which has 5½ acres of tropical gardens and 300 animals.

The Islands of The Bahamas form a 100,000-square-mile archipelago that extends more than 500 miles. There are 700 islands including uninhabited cays. Island hopping is very popular with tourists, be it by Bahamas Fast Ferry, a high-speed catamaran that goes to Harbour Island or North Eleuthera, or with a Bahamasair flight to the popular Grand Bahama Island, 55 miles east of the Florida coast, or to The Abacos, called the "Sailing Capital of the World" or "Sailor's Nirvana."

The Abacos' five most important inhabited cays are Walker's Cay, Green Turtle Cay, Great Guana Cay, Man-O-War Cay and Elbow Cay. Along with boating, deep-sea fishing will keep you on the waters. On land, you can explore caves, sisal plantation ruins and lighthouses, and visit Pelican Cay National Park and the Abaco National Park.

There are many quaint accommodations in The Abacos. You can find luxury at The Abaco Club Cabanas on Winding Bay, operated by the Ritz Carlton, with its own golf course and pricey Cape Cod-style homes. For those considering purchasing a winter getaway, the cabanas and facilities, including a full-service spa, are available for a one-time-only holiday while you house-hunt.

MURRAY FRUM GIVES TREASURED BERNINI BRONZE TO AGO

In keeping with his long habit of generosity towards the Art Gallery of Ontario, Toronto developer and art collector Murray Frum has given the AGO a prized Italian baroque bronze masterpiece called Corpus by sculptor Gian Lorenzo Bernini (1598-1680). The piece, one of the artist's favourites, is a crucifix measuring five feet six inches, and long considered one of the most significant works by an Old Master still in private hands. Its worth is estimated at more than $50 million.

"Corpus was immediately appealing because of the beauty and emotion of the subject," said Frum, chairman of the Frum Development Group and a member of the AGO board. "When we learned it could be traced back to Bernini's own collection and was an object that he made for himself, it was clear we were in the presence of a unique work of art, a masterpiece that would be a highlight of any collection."

AGO officials are naturally thrilled at the exquisite gift, a public unveiling of which is planned for June.

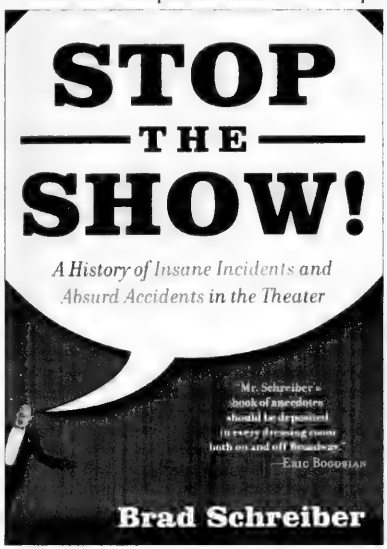
Writer documents wacky theatrics

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

To patrons of the arts, theatre-going is serious business. But a book released last fall shows how it can also be hilarious.

Titled Stop The Show! A History of Insane Incidents and Absurd Accidents in the Theater, the book, published by Thunder's Mouth Press in New York, highlights more than a century of the behind-the-scenes and very public misadventures of some stars of the stage.

Brad Schreiber



STOP
SHOW!
A History of Insane Incidents and Absurd Accidents in the Theater
"Mr. Schreiber's book of anecdotes should be deposited in every dressing room both on and off Broadway."
—Eric Bogosian
Brad Schreiber

Inspired by a friend's hysterically funny theatrical mishap in the 1980s (found in the book's preface but unrepeatable here), Los Angeles-based theatre critic, journalist and author Brad Schreiber spent nine months compiling the roughly 400 anecdotes found in Stop The Show!

The results, gathered from the United States, Canada and around the world, can make you laugh out loud.

There are stories of lines gone wrong, actors freezing up onstage, scenery disasters, costume malfunctions and panicked ad-libs in the heat of a scene.

As Schreiber states in the preface, "Theatre… when it works, my friends, when it really works, there is nothing like it. And when something unplanned happens… it lives in your mind forever."

And as a Jew with an admitted "sense of the absurdity of life," Schreiber plants some rich gems for readers to discover.

The book is divided into six sections for easy reference: actors' lines, costumes and makeup, scenery, outside noise, actors' movements onstage and audience-actor interaction.

But readers can flip through to any of its 251 pages and find an amusing yarn.

One of Schreiber's personal favourites involves legendary comic Andy Kaufman, who sparked a riot in San Francisco with his abrasive alter-ego/act, lounge-singer Tony Clifton.

In another incident, two actors from the Young People's Theatre troupe of Canada garbled their lines and ended up teaching a class of young schoolchildren a very off-colour metaphor. Several of the teachers present at the play fainted.

Another time, actor Nathan Lane had to creatively explain away a stubborn prop during a Broadway production of Mel Brooks' The Producers.

Even the greats get exposed when Schreiber reveals how Barbra Streisand momentarily lost top billing for a performance of Funny Girl, when her co-lead won the audience over by forgetting to zip his fly for a whole scene.

Schreiber relentlessly pummels his readers with these terrific vignettes. But deciding which snippets made the grade was sometimes difficult.

"I rejected good stories that could not be verified and stories that I deemed mundane or similar to even better stories I had already chosen," Schreiber told the CJN via e-mail. "Who wants five stories about vomiting while onstage? There has to be one ideal vomiting story, one with a twist, to even bother."

Schreiber, who has lectured at the Surrey Writers Conference in Vancouver, is fond of Canada and reserves some special places for Canadian actors in his book.

"Donald Sutherland has two stories in Stop the Show!, as does Bruce Gray, who gets the final one, a hilarious and thoughtful tale about performing for Inuits in a small… community centre," Schreiber wrote.

Stop The Show! is a great addition to either the amateur or veteran theatre connoisseur's library and is available on Amazon.com.

American Jew and Palestinian Arab find common ground

Prisoners: A Muslim and a Jew Across the Middle East Divide* by Jeffrey Goldberg (Alfred A. Knopf).

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jeffrey Goldberg was born in Long Island, N.Y., and raised in a liberal, non-observant Jewish family. He could have become a doctor, a lawyer or an accountant, every Jewish mother's dream vocations, yet when he was a young man, he settled in Israel and became a military policeman, guarding 6,000 Palestinian prisoners at Ketziot, the largest prison ever built by Israel.

Jeffrey Goldberg

Not exactly what his parents had in mind.

Ketziot, a place he says stank of diesel oil, melted tar, body odour and urine, might have been an insignificant but exotic chapter in Goldberg's life had it not been for Rafiq Hijaji, a Palestinian Arab from the Gaza Strip he befriended.

This unusual friendship is an important component in Goldberg's sensitively written book, Prisoners: A Muslim and a Jew Across the Middle East Divide (Alfred A. Knopf), which is both optimistic and pessimistic about the prospects for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Now the Washington correspondent of The New Yorker, Goldberg made aliyah in the late 1980s, when the first and far less deadly Palestinian uprising was still in progress. The scion of agnostic and assimilated Jews who had a dim view of organized religion, he was smitten by Israel after his bar mitzvah at the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

When he returned to the United States, he "burned with love for Israel." His parents gave him a paperback copy of Leon Uris' novel, Exodus, which served as "the script notes for my dream life." Exodus spurred him to read the works of Zionist luminaries such as Theodor Herzl, Max Nordau and Vladimir Jabotinsky, and they, in turn, buttressed his commitment to Israel, "the polestar of my existence."

In time, Israel felt like "home," while Long Island seemed like "exile." The passages in which he describes his honeymoon with Zionism are among the most evocative in this finely crafted volume.

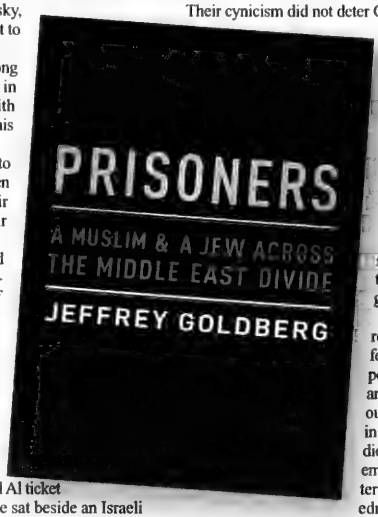
For a while, Goldberg was sympathetic to the Zionist Revisionism of Jabotinsky and even drawn to the rabid ideology of Rabbi Meir Kahane. But he was soon repulsed by their ideas and became a socialist Zionist.

Many of his friends, however, were turned off by Israel and poured their hearts into universal causes, supporting the campesinos of El Salvador and the American Indian movement and condemning South African Jews for their complicity in apartheid. "They didn't see the poetry of Entebbe, they didn't see the justice in the sword of Israel, they didn't feel kinship with their people," he writes in a typically lucid passage.

Having reached the conclusion that "exile" was a "disease" and that Israel was the "cure," Goldberg purchased a one-way El Al ticket to Israel. En route to the Promised Land, he sat beside an Israeli who had left the country and now lived in New York. "I disapproved of him immediately," he writes with the indignation of a convert. Goldberg's opinion of him plummeted even further when he wondered why an able-bodied person would wish to move to Israel.

Goldberg was happy in his first home in Israel, Kibbutz Mishmar Ha'Emek, where he tended to chickens in a lool. "My lungs filled with feathers and my fingernails were stained black with muck. But I loved the work. This was the fulfilment of my dream. I was a Hebrew labourer, a Tolstoyan ascetic."

Yet some of the kibbutzniks were mistrustful of newcomers like himself who, they believed, came to Israel "in flight from failure."



Their cynicism did not deter Goldberg. "It was here that a Jew could become something noble," he observes. Eventually, he soured on the kibbutz, finding the majority of its members narrow, clannish and cold.

It was then that he was inducted into the army and sent to Ketziot, which rose from the floor of the Negev Desert and was hurriedly built to accommodate "the flower" of the intifadah: the foot soldiers, the squad commanders, the generals and even the propagandists.

Consisting mainly of row upon row of tents and miles of steel fences and barbed wires, with few permanent structures, Ketziot was an entirely alien entity to Goldberg, outside his frame of reference and, in his view, "a monument to expediency, poor planning and the ephemeral nature of cheap building materials." An "island of small-mindedness and cruelty," it was also devoid of culture.

Normally, guards were not permitted to speak to inmates. But since Goldberg was a "prisoner counsellor," he could engage prisoners in conversation. And the prisoner he talked to most was Rafiq, a religiously devout man approximately his age who was smart, observant, ironical and analytical. "I wanted to make Rafiq my friend," he writes. "I felt this keenly, almost from the moment we met."

Although they differed on basic political issues, he and Rafiq both abhorred violence and agreed that a two-state solution was the key to resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Goldberg lost touch with Rafiq after finishing his stint as an army policeman. He began writing a humour column for the Jerusalem Post, "an unfunny and revanchist newspaper" that banned the word "occupation" in reference to Israel's grip on the territories.

The longer he lived in Israel, the more he grew disillusioned. "A melancholy realization was coming over me: I was not at home here." He explains his attitude in a succinct but palpable paragraph that ends with this sentence: "Israel is a flawed place, with flawed people, just like everywhere else. But it is not so easy to shake off dreams of Utopia."

But when he went back to the United States, he admits, he was ill at ease. "Only in Israel did I feel American."

Returning to Israel on assignment as a freelancer for the New York Times' Sunday magazine, Goldberg looked up Rafiq in the Jebalya refugee camp. Rafiq, whose family was originally from Majdal (Ashkelon), was teaching statistics at the Islamic University in Gaza. He had earned an MA from the American University in Washington, D.C, where Goldberg and his wife lived, and now he was planning to return to pursue a Ph.D degree.

Their friendship was still intact, notwithstanding Rafiq's embrace of Islamic fundamentalism and Goldberg's revulsion from it.

To Rafiq, who would win a tenure-track job at a university in the United Arab Emirates, Goldberg remained a friend. These sentiments are embedded in the last few paragraphs of Prisoners.

"When I hear about something terrible happening in Jebalya, my first thoughts are of you and your father," Goldberg says.

"It's the same for me," Rafiq replies. "When I hear that there is a bombing in Jerusalem and I know you're there, I get worried."

"I must have looked surprised just then, because Rafiq said: 'I mean, I don't want you to die. I want you to live.'"

To which Goldberg adds, "And this, I thought, might be the start of something."

Israelis and Palestinians are deeply divided, but if they can ever break out of their mutual isolation and learn to know each other on a personal level, like Goldberg and Rafiq did, there may be hope after all.

And that is the message of Prisoners.

Israeli hospital combines high-tech, human touch

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Zeev Rotstein ends the call on his ultra-thin cellphone, spins it around in his hand, places it on the table in front of him and smiles with satisfaction.

This represents the next frontier of medical evolution, he says, looking down at the device.

Beyond the capabilities already built into portable phones

Dr. Zeev Rotstein

– games, text messaging, Internet browsing, music and what not – Rotstein says the cellphone is also being turned into a monitoring device that transmits medical information.

Employing technology developed in Israel and now in clinical trials in the United States, the Bluetooth-equipped phones are being used to transmit information that can save lives.

"With Bluetooth [short range wireless technology] you can capture medical signals from a patient. It can sense life-threatening signals," Rotstein said, referring to conditions such as heart arrhythmia, low blood glucose and other medical indicators. The information is obtained and transmitted to doctors and emergency services while also updating a patient's medical databank, he said.

The Chaim Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer, Israel's largest medical facility, is "the home of many Israeli medical technology developments," he said.

Rotstein is chief executive officer of Tel Hashomer, but this winter he's on sabbatical at Northwestern University in Chicago, where he's overseeing a "home telemonitoring project" that promises to add yet another function to cellphones. He was in Toronto recently to meet with supporters of the hospital.

A cardiologist who's been a hospital administrator for more than 10 years, Rotstein stresses that Tel Hashomer is also the archetypical people's hospital, serving a broad cross-section of Israelis – even some Palestinians.

With 2,000 beds, it is "a monster" on the outskirts of Tel Aviv, in the middle of Israel's population heartland. It is staffed by 6,000 employees, including 850 physicians and more than 2,000 nurses.

It provides all manner of medical services, from acute care to rehabilitation services, all the while serving as a teaching hospital associated with Tel Aviv University.

"We do the most complicated treatment and are a community-needs hospital," Rotstein said. Parents send their developmentally disabled and autistic children to the hospital for special programs, while elderly patients enjoy a variety of programs and many take advantage of the hospital's chronic care programs.

"It's unique in that we do everything," Rotstein said, adding that despite its size, Tel Hashomer staff haven't lost the human touch.

"We are simple people," he said. "We are part of the people of Israel. That means the patient immediately gets our sympathy. He is not coming to Mecca and we try to guarantee everyone not only the best treatment, but to be sympathetic to the patient. We will put our hands on your shoulder. We will listen to you. We call it the Sheba spirit."

About 80 Tel Hashomer doctors were called up during last summer's Hezbollah war, and the hospital played a big part in treating wounded soldiers. As a result of its experiences, the hospital is moving to improve its rehabilitation programs. After receiving acute care treatment at other hospitals, more than 100 wounded soldiers were sent to Tel Hashomer for treatment, and 10 still remain, months after the conflict ended, he said.

Injuries in Lebanon generally were not caused by rifle bullets as in past wars, but were worse because Hezbollah fighters' personal weapon of choice seems to have been the more deadly anti-tank rockets.

Prior to that conflict, Tel Hashomer had developed the concept of a "virtual hospital," in which computers, simulators and actors combine to provide doctors and emergency response teams training in responding to catastrophic events, such as chemical, biological and nuclear attacks. The Mayo Clinic in Minnesota and the Albert Einstein Medical Center in Sao Paulo contract with Tel Hashomer for training in those areas.

Two of the hospital's programs are geared for Palestinian youngsters. "We are the only facility that cares for Palestinian kids with cancer and we accept them without condition," Rotstein said. The second program treats congenital heart failure. Without the programs – 80 per cent success rate for cancer patients, better than 90 per cent for heart treatment – "they are dying."

Operated in collaboration with the Peres Fund for Peace, the hospital treats 50 Palestinian kids or more at any one time and special residences are available for their families. It is an irony at Chaim Sheba that many of the doctors taking care of the Palestinians are also soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces, he added.

"We feel that in this way, we are advancing peace among peoples and we feel every family is an ambassador. They see not just the tip of the rifle and soldiers. We show them another side of Israel – smiling, caring staff that tries to help them reduce their misery and cure them."

One pair of Palestinian boys, aged 10 and 12, were electrocuted while trying to retrieve a kite tangled in power lines. They spent more than one year in rehab, being fitted with prosthetic arms and legs before being returned to Gaza, he said. What's more, they and others using the hospital, were not charged any fee.

The hospital charges the Israeli government insurer, receives income from a number of contractual services it provides internationally and raises money in Israel and abroad from support groups.

Tel Hashomer has particularly effective friends groups in Austria – many of them not Jewish – Germany, France and the United Kingdom.

The centre sends many doctors to Canada for training, and Jewish missions to Israel often stop at Tel Hashomer for a tour.

As for financial support, Canadian Jews, he acknowledged, have many different charitable organizations seeking their support. "Awareness is very important for us. We want every Jew to be proud of what we do for the people of Israel and for the area as well. We care very much about it."

What's in our food?

Q. Lately, I have wondered whether we are too concerned about how our food looks and tastes, and not concerned enough about what's in it. How can we address this issue?

A. We love the idea of buying a cake that will stay fresh for a week, or fruit that has been shipped here from places all around the world and still looks fresh and perfect after it's been in the fridge for three days. We buy packaged foods that are fat free, sugar free and still tasty, and brightly coloured snack foods for our kids. All of these convenience foods and products look great, usually for a long time, and even frequently taste great, but most of us never ask what is in the foods to make this possible.

But we should be asking. Is the most important thing to us at the grocery store how long a food lasts and how good it looks? I think it often is for many of us, followed by price, which is, of course, an essential consideration. But do we buy junky foods just because they're affordable?

When I have patients in my office who want to eat healthier for their own sake as well as for that of their families, we often end up having a discussion about which products they should choose, which they should avoid, how to read labels and what many of the unrecognizable ingredients actually are. This often ends with the patients becoming committed to being more conscious of what is in the food they choose. In addition, they begin to wonder why this has not been a priority or concern in the past.

In general, we may check to see if a food is trans fat free, or we may want to know its fat or calorie content, but are we at all interested in what else is in there?

The great news is that there is so much available on the mainstream market now that is more natural, with fewer artificial colours, preservatives, additives, chemicals, flavourings, pesticides, herbicides, fertilizers, bad fats, excessive salts, etc. Simply by walking into any grocery store and paying attention to these details, we can cut down on the number of unnatural ingredients that we put into our bodies and the bodies of our children each day.

It's important to note that we should direct the most attention to the foods we feed our children, because the snack foods targeted at kids, the ones our kids love to eat, are often the worst. However, great alternatives do exist.

Take a few extra minutes to look at the labels the next time you're in the grocery store. Or have a look in your pantry. Try to see if there is an alternative product that would be healthier than the one you usually use. After all, isn't the point to eat food that is good for us and to know what's in it? Or are we okay with not caring? Make sure you know what you're getting – the nutrition label only tells part of the story.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

220 Canadians make aliyah

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Jared Sarfin is seen on the plane heading to Israel.

TEL AVIV — Ever since he visited Israel for the first time with his family in 1996, Jared Sarfin knew that it was his destiny to live here.

"I always imagined that I would raise my family in Israel, surrounded by Jews, where I could help promote the growth of the country and demonstrate my commitment to the future of Israel and its people," says the 25-year-old from Thornhill. "It is where I have always felt most Jewish and most at home. It's just where I want to be."

Since that visit, Sarfin returned to Israel several times: as a kibbutz volunteer in 2000; a birthright israel participant in 2001; an Aish Hatorah Hasbarah Fellow in 2004; and as a participant in the 10-month Otzma program in 2005.

"That program gave me the chance to work and live with Israelis," he says. "I fell in love with the people and the culture. It was after those 10 months that I came to the conclusion that I needed to live in Israel – and soon."

Sarfin returned to Toronto after Otzma and began working for the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, a non-profit group that supports active duty soldiers. "It was a great cause, and an experience that helped me to decide that I didn't want to go into business, but into non-profit work for the Jewish community," says the graduate of the York University Shulich School of Business.

The only problem was that he missed Israel. "I had a very rich Jewish life in Toronto – the community in Toronto is great. I wasn't lacking," he says. "But I just felt this constant pull to return to Israel."

It wasn't until Sarfin learned about Nefesh B'Nefesh (NBN), an organization dedicated to revitalizing North American immigration to Israel by removing or minimizing the financial, professional, logistical and social obstacles to aliyah, that he realized his lifelong dream could finally become a reality. "I knew I was going to make aliyah, and I didn't want to put it off. But I didn't know when I would be able to," Sarfin says. "Nefesh B'Nefesh was my lifeline. I wouldn't have been able to do it without them."

Sarfin was among 220 new immigrants, ranging in age from eight weeks to 87 years old, and hailing from 21 U.S. states and four Canadian cities (Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Ottawa), to arrive on the 23rd Nefesh B'Nefesh flight on Dec, 27.

Natan Sharansky, head of the Strategic Studies Institute at the Shalem Center; former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, Dore Gold, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs; and Nefesh B'Nefesh co-founders Tony Gelbart and Rabbi Joshua Fass were at Ben-Gurion Airport to welcome the new immigrants. They were the last group of more than 3,200 Jews to immigrate to Israel through Nefesh B'Nefesh in 2006.

> 'I just felt this constant pull to return to Israel'

The flight and arrival were unforgettable experiences, Sarfin says. "There is no way to describe how amazing it was to be on a flight with all of these Jews, making aliyah together. Going through the same thing together at the same time was an unforgettable experience."

Sarfin's Nefesh B'Nefesh shaliach put together a Facegroup account for the immigrants headed to Ulpan Etzion in Jerusalem, to prolong their sense of togetherness and to help the new olim support each other throughout the aliyah process.

"I connected with so many people who I will be studying Hebrew with for the next five months before I left Toronto, so although I came alone, I already feel like I have a network of friends in Israel," he says.

Like Sarfin, Leah Charney, 22, intended to make aliyah for some time but wasn't able to do so without the help of Nefesh B'Nefesh.

"Moving here was a long-term goal of mine," says the graduate of the psychology and rehabilitation services programs at York University and Seneca College. "Nefesh B'Nefesh made it possible for me to realize that goal now."

Although they are both happy on the whole, their arrival has not been without small challenges. "I have been running around the last few weeks doing bureaucratic things," Sarfin says.

"Nefesh B'Nefesh really lightened this load, too, but there's still quite a bit of running around to do."

NBN, which recently gained a new co-chairman (outgoing Israeli ambassador to the United States Danny Ayalon) has brought more than 10,000 new immigrants to Israel from North America and Britain, including more than 700 of them from Canada, since it was founded in 2001.

Charity dinner to honour 1967 Leafs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's hard to conceive of a sports team held in as much awe as the 1967 Toronto Maple Leafs – at least in Toronto.

For fans of the Blue and White, the team is legendary on a number of accounts. They were the last group to win a Stanley Cup in the last pre-expansion season, denying the mighty Canadiens the opportunity to display it at Expo 67. They were a team deemed too old to get into the playoffs, let alone get past the high-flying Black Hawks and Habs. They were a team about to be dismantled, yet they overcame a mediocre regular season to pull together and win one more time as a group. They were the last team from hockey-mad Toronto to actually win the Cup before beginning their 40-years – and counting – of wandering in the hockey desert.

Fans still utter the names Keon, Armstrong, Pulford, Horton and Bower as if referring to larger-than-life heroes from Mount Olympus. So, it's no surprise that when five of them got together to announce a 40th-anniversary reunion dinner, the media turned out in droves and the press coverage was extensive.

Hersh Borenstein, who was born after the Leafs last won the Cup, is the guy who pulled together the dinner and hitched it to a charitable cause. About a year and a half ago, he was speaking to Eddie Shack and Johnny Bower and learned that no one was planning a reunion event to mark the 40th anniversary of their victory. Recognizing the importance of that particular edition of the Leafs, he decided he might as well do it.

The '67 Leafs possess "an aura" about them, much like the 1927 Yankees, he said.

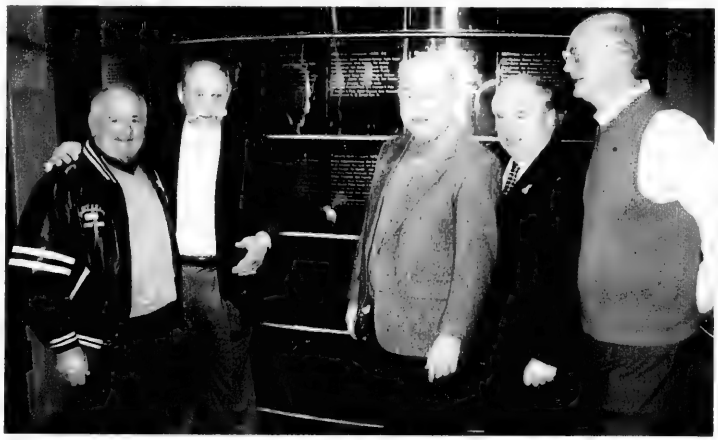
Borenstein, event chair of the 40th Anniversary Stanley Cup Dinner, leveraged his personal connections to many Leaf players and other hockey greats to put together the tribute.

Owner of Frozen Pond, a sports memorabilia company he founded, Borenstein has many friends and business acquaintances in the hockey world. Working the phones, he was able to convince most Leaf players to agree to participate.

"The vast majority" will attend the "once-in-a-lifetime event," he told a news conference at the Hockey Hall of Fame announcing the dinner.

Tickets for the dinner, set for March 22 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, run at $450 and proceeds go the Make-A-Wish Foundation, which grants wishes to children facing life-threatening illnesses.

Borenstein is convinced the dinner will be a roaring success, despite the rather steep ticket price. Dinner-goers will receive a lithograph signed by the players, which in itself is a $325 value. Plus, he said, consider the profiles of the guests. In addition to the Leafs of yesteryear, hockey greats Jean Beliveau and Phil Esposito will be in attendance.



They were titans once - former Leafs, from left, Bobby Baun, Eddie Shack, Red Kelly, Ron Ellis and Brian Conacher were at The Hockey Hall of Fame to announce the 40th Anniversary Stanley Cup Dinner. [Paul Lungen photo]

Among the Leafs who have agreed to attend – and participate in a sports autograph and memorabilia show at the Convention Centre that runs through March 25 – are Allan Stanley, Marcel Pronovost, Larry Hillman, Red Kelly, Ron Ellis, Brian Conacher, Bob Pulford and Shack.

Shack, Conacher, Ellis, Kelly and Bobby Baun were at last week's news conference.

Baun is looking forward to the reunion, but he adds with a cautionary note, "the part you get upset at is that it could be the last time… We're really looking forward to getting the fellows together."

Looking back on the Leafs' success in that Centennial Year, Baun believes "the reason the team was so great is that we were a team."

The players, many of them veterans, enjoyed a lot of shared experiences, he said.

And, adding a point that runs contrary to the received wisdom about the '67 Leafs, he does not believe the team had even reached its full potential. There were "some of the best young guys coming up," and if the team had been kept together, they'd have been tutored by veteran Leafs who were real students of the game.

Instead, he said, the Leafs lost key players like Stanley to expansion.

Ellis, director of public relations for the Hockey Hall of Fame, said he continues to "bleed blue. I follow the team and I go up and down with the team."

Back in 1967, he was one of the younger Leafs. Once they got past Chicago in the first round (his role was to check superstar Bobby Hull), "some of the veterans saw it could be their last hurrah," he said. "We knew the team was going to be broken up, and we knew it was the last chance to play together."

Looking back on that playoff run, Ellis acknowledges that "it was a close team. There's just a bond that develops when you go through what we did that year. I'd go through a wall for these guys."

A problem that demands attention

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Over the last few months, a horrifying child-abuse scandal has been unfolding in a haredi neighbourhood of Brooklyn, N.Y.

First-person testimonials and police records – which, since last May, have been adding up by the week – allege that Rabbi Yehuda Kolko, a teacher and assistant principal at Yeshiva-Mesivta Torah Temimah in Brooklyn, has been molesting and sexually abusing his young students for somewhere between 25 and 30 years.

New Views

What's more, many of the allegations also claim that Torah Temimah's administration, led by Rabbi Lipa Margulies, along with a number of American beit dins and senior rabbinic leaders, have been covering-up complaints about Rabbi Kolko since the mid-1970s. According to some accusers, over the years Rabbi Margulies and other rabbinic figures have used threats of expulsion and/or excommunication to keep victims and their families quiet.

Many have preached patience while the courts investigate the Kolko affair (he was arrested at the beginning of December), but where there's smoke, there's usually fire.

And this isn't the first time abuse in the Orthodox community has become public knowledge. In 2000, for example, a report in the New York Jewish Week accused Rabbi Baruch Lanner, a former NCSY supervisor, of abusing young girls over a 30-year period. He is currently serving a seven-year prison sentence.

And don't think similar allegations haven't arisen in Canada – a simple Google search uncovers numerous websites and forums with accusations against some of our teachers as well.

The Kolko affair has blown the lid off of two main problems: child abuse in the Orthodox community and an institutional cover-up of abuse claims (Orthodox Union officials were similarly accused of trying to hide the Lanner scandal).

Most agree that the former is an awful crime that should be stopped, but in the Orthodox community, some religious leaders argue that these abuse scandals must be kept hush-hush, citing a desire to solve community problems within the community.

That's where the problem starts.

It's easy for Orthodox leaders to argue in favour of keeping things within the community – they can cite a desire to avoid lashon hara or fears of bad publicity should the mass media get their hands on the story.

But in some cases, such as the Kolko affair, it seems that professing such fears is simply a cover for attempts to ignore the problem. The sad reality is that some people would rather bury the problem rather than solve it.

This most recent case should motivate Canadian Jews to implement an independent and dedicated system to fight child and sexual abuse (the United States already has JSafe).

Sadly, many Orthodox kids simply don't know what constitutes abuse – they aren't taught that it's wrong for a teacher or camp counsellor to touch or engage them in certain ways (and the fact that many teachers don't understand those boundaries is equally alarming).

As well, young abuse victims often are unaware that law enforcement and trauma agencies can protect them and punish the abusers. If we want to start helping ourselves out of this mess, we must start by educating children and parents of their rights, and training teachers, rabbis and other religious leaders to prevent or identify potential problems.

This education and awareness program group should be non-denominational – child abuse among Jews is most certainly not the exclusive problem of Orthodox Jews – but perhaps that's too much to ask. Nonetheless, an independent group devoted exclusively to child abuse – one that would govern school officials, synagogue clergy and rabbinic boards – would surely be more vigilant in rooting out child abusers. Such a body would also be less inclined to succumb to the wishes of religious leaders who seek to protect their own necks (and wallets) by conveniently sweeping the problem under the carpet.

The Orthodox community has an abuse problem. Recent events may call attention to only a few cases, but they could also indicate a more widespread problem. Either way, it's time to do something.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

A box of Kellogg's Corn Flakes cost 10 cents at the M. Rubinoff grocery store in Toronto in the early 1920s. Yechiel Rosenzweig's bar mitzvah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It's not easy to read an entire Torah portion at 13 years old. Standing in front of shul members whom you have known your entire life and making a dvar Torah is a daunting prospect for anybody, let alone a new teenager.

But on Jan. 13 that is exactly what Yechiel Rosenzweig did at Clanton Park shul. He celebrated his bar mitzvah, and did so magnificently.

Yechiel is my nephew. He is the sixth child of David (rest in peace) and Chavie Rosenzweig; their fifth son. I have been fortunate to have celebrated many simchot with my family, as we have a very large one, however, there was something about Yechiel's bar mitzvah – something a little bit different.

Yechiel's father, David, was taken from us four years ago. Most of you will remember David's death as it was news that made its way around the world. Only four short months after David's demise, his son Shragie celebrated his bar mitzvah. That was a difficult moment in our family's life – the numbness of losing David had not subsided, although Chavie and family were able to get through it, with sheer adrenaline and the drive to ensure Shragie's bar mitzvah was special for him.

Yechiel's bar mitzvah, however, was a different experience. It was because the adage that time heals is indeed true. Four years is not a long time, and indeed David's mother and brothers would tell you it feels like yesterday that David's life ended, but the rawness of those days, those weeks and months is gone. The cutting pain that many of us felt, our inability to sleep and smile, is in the past.

Therefore when Yechiel approached the Torah on Jan. 13, well prepared and ready to read his portion, he did so with joy in his heart. I know this because I saw the smile stretching across his angelic face whenever someone would whisper a mazel tov in his ear or when the candies were hurled at him.

Yechiel was laughing. There was real bliss on his face, and there was the excitement of knowing he had arrived at this day – one that would never come his way again.

And Yechiel was brilliant. He was, because over the last four years he has made the most out of every possibility to grow. He also has had the benefit of unconditional love from his brothers and sister, who stuck together supporting one another in a way that any family would want to emulate.

Yechiel's bar mitzvah was great because he has learned how to truly be the man we speak of when we define the meaning behind this rite of passage. He became this diminutive man while watching Chavie as she pushed herself to ensure that she and her family would not only survive their loss but also turn life around and make it positive – exactly how David would have wanted it.

Yechiel's bar mitzvah is a simchah for the entire Jewish community of Toronto. It is because this mighty little warrior represents the resilience of our people; our ability to build castles on the ashes of our tragedies and to do so with effervescence and the desire to strengthen ourselves and the Jewish people.

Yechiel Rosenzweig just had his bar mitzvah. Mazel tov and welcome into the world of Jewish adulthood. Mazel tov to you, Chavie. Your son has emulated your grace and courage. And mazel tov to you, David, for raising such a splendid son who shares your curiosity, commitment to our people and Israel, and has a soul that shines ever so brightly.

Israeli president faces indictment

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Israelis who have had to deal with the Lebanon war and a slew of government corruption scandals now find their president facing a rape indictment.

Though President Moshe Katsav has denied wrongdoing, the announcement last week that Attorney General Menachem Mazuz intends to press charges prompted Katsav to step down temporarily, even as lawmakers began impeachment proceedings against him.

The scandal has sparked an outburst of recrimination that suggests many in the Jewish state want the sort of high-level purge they think might finally set the country straight.

"Resign," read a banner headline on the Yediot Achronot newspaper.

"Go home," the rival daily Ma'ariv pitched in.

Katsav, 61, a married father of five, faces the prospect of an indictment that includes charges of rape and sexual harassment against four female ex-employees, as well as of fraud and breach of trust over allegations that he abused his executive privileges.

Israeli President Moshe Katsav proclaims his innocence against rape allegations last week. [Israel Sun photo]

It's the first time an incumbent Israeli head of state has been accused of such serious felonies. If convicted on the most serious charge, Katsav could be jailed for 16 years.

At an emotional news conference last week, Katsav announced that he was declaring himself temporarily incapacitated – incapable of fulfilling his duties. Though he is immune from criminal prosecution as president, Katsav told the High Court of Justice last year that if he were indicted, he would step down while the case is underway.

The Knesset house committee subsequently voted to approve a three-month temporary leave.

But Katsav appeared for work at his President's Residence chamber, despite having announced his temporary incapacitation, Israel Radio reported on Monday.

New JTS head stresses importance of mutual respect

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The two main tasks for Jews today – and by extension, for the Conservative movement – are to build community and present tradition in a way that's "relevant, authentic, beautiful and deep," says Arnold Eisen, chancellor-elect of the movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS).

Despite concerns about Conservative Judaism losing adherents in recent years, Eisen says he is confident the movement is not in decline.

In a keynote address on "The Jewish Theological Seminary and the Conservative Movement: Its Vision and Place in North America," part of the sixth annual Torah in Toronto program held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Jan. 20, Eisen said that "a series of sociological factors," including mobility and an aging population, are working against the movement.

He believes it's important to "build on the strengths we've got," he said, citing Conservative Judaism's Ramah summer camps, synagogues, energetic and committed JTS students, and Solomon Schechter schools.

Eisen said that three areas strike him as "obviously in need of some work." He calls them "message," "quality," and "structure."

The News in Brief

Canada

Groups Target Tories

OTTAWA — Canadian Muslim and Arab leaders are threatening to work against the Conservatives in the next election because of the government's support for Israel. The leaders cited perceived snubs and said the Tories' strong pro-Israel stance has compromised Canada's standing in the Middle East. Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, who returned last week from a visit to the region, "is not accessible to the Canadian Arab and Muslim community," said Mohamed Elmasry, president of the Canadian-Islamic Congress. Khaled Mouammar, president of the Canadian Arab Federation, said various Muslim and Arab groups have started contacting churches, unions and other groups to dissuade them from voting Tory in the next election, CanWest News reported.

Attack Was Hate: CJC

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress is urging Montreal police to recognize the Jan. 17 attack on L'école Les jeunes musulmans canadiens in Ville St Laurent as a hate crime. On Jan. 18, CJC officials and Rabbis Chaim Steinmetz and Reuben Poupko visited the Muslim school and saw the damage first hand. "The destruction at this school was not simply the act of reckless vandals," said Rabbi Steinmetz. "The rocks, the broken glass – whoever did this was trying to send a message." CJC said police should create a hate-crimes unit to deal with racism-related crimes.

Survivor Remembered

LETHBRIDGE, Alta. — The Galt Museum and Archives is hosting an exhibit on the life of a Shoah survivor who settled in southern Alberta after the war. "Auschwitz: the Eva Brewster Story" opened Jan. 27 and runs until April 29 at the Lethbridge, Alta., museum. Brewster's daughter and first husband died in Auschwitz. The Soviets liberated her from the camp near the end of the war and she became a partisan. She later married a British soldier and settled in Alberta in 1981. She died in 2004.

Dichter to Visit Cda.

JERUSALEM — Israel's minister of public security, Avi Dichter, will meet his Canadian counterpart, Stockwell Day, during a visit to Canada next month. The trip aims to further bilateral ties that have reached a "peak" since the Tories took power a year ago, Israel said last week. Dichter will also meet Prime Minister Stephen Harper and other MPs.

Politician Convicted

PARIS — Far-right French politician Bruno Gollnisch was convicted of Holocaust denial. A French court fined Gollnisch, deputy head of Jean-Marie LePen's National Front Party in France and a member of the European Parliament, 5000 euros and gave him a suspended sentence for questioning in 2004 how many Jews died in the Shoah and whether the Nazis had gas chambers in concentration camps. He must also pay the groups who sued him and was suspended from a university teaching job in Lyon for five years. Gollnisch, who heads a new far-right caucus in the European Parliament, called the verdict "repressive" and said he'll appeal.

Group Accused of Being 'Front for Israel'

TORONTO — Three Canadian Arab and Muslim groups last week accused a Toronto-based right-wing group of being a "front for yet another pro-Israel lobby."

In a joint statement, the Canadian Islamic Congress, the Canadian Arab Federation and the Muslim Canadian Forum said that the name of the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD) "has deceived politicians, the media, and the public about its true intentions and ideology."

The CCD "has never addressed any serious democratic issues in Canada" and "instead… is promoting only Israel's agenda," the groups said. They added that the CCD "also promotes an anti-Arab and anti-Muslim agenda" and urged it to change its name to "the Canadian Coalition for Israel."

In a response posted on the CCD's website, president Alastair Gordon said his group has been called "a 'tool of Taiwan,' a 'mouthpiece for Lebanon,' a 'promoter of Indian hegemony,' a 'propagandist for the Sri Lankan government,' 'a lapdog of George Bush,' a 'Stephen Harper toady,' 'and now 'the Canadian Coalition for Israel.'

"And as for our failure to address democracy issues within Canada, if the current critics had read our mission statement, they would see that we focus on Canadian foreign policy, and its relation to democratic allies."

Founded in 2003, the CCD calls itself "a non-partisan, multi-ethnic, multi-religious organization of concerned Canadians dedicated to the protection and promotion of democracy at home and abroad." Its website says that Canada's "foreign policy has in the past consistently failed to support sister democracies who share our values, including India, Taiwan, the United States, Israel, and others who are under attack on the front lines of tyranny and global terrorism."

Project seeks to make synagogues green

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Four Ontario shuls are aiming to make their buildings and their congregants' homes more energy efficient as part of a national interfaith environmental initiative.

"It makes a lot of sense," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, which is taking part in the program and held an educational program last fall that included distributing low-energy light bulbs. "We all have to do our little bit," the rabbi said. "Everyone suffers when we have a polluted environment."

He noted that Tu b'Shvat, which falls this year on Feb. 3, is "a great time to say thank you… [Being environmentally sensitive] is a nice way of saying to God, 'We don't take for granted the blessings you give to us.'"

Other synagogues in the program are Toronto's First Narayever Congregation and Congregation Darchei Noam, and Temple Israel in Ottawa.

Rory O'Brien of Faith & the Common Good, a national group that facilitates interfaith action on social and environmental matters, is co-ordinating the organization's Greening Sacred Spaces program, which is less than a year old. In Ontario, which has more than 6,000 places of worship, the program is currently focusing on the Toronto, Ottawa and Waterloo regions, he said. The program also has affiliates in Calgary, Vancouver and on the East Coast. There are 30,000 faith buildings across the country, he noted.

Faith & the Common Good and Green Communities Canada, a national association of non-profit organizations that deliver environmental services, held a day-long planning session last week in Toronto to discuss how the churches, synagogues and other faith communities in the program can realize large-scale energy savings in their places of worship.

Although there were no synagogue representatives at the invitation-only meeting, which had 32 participants including representatives of agencies, funders and non-governmental organizations, the Ontario synagogues are already working with Faith & the Common Good (FCG) to lower energy consumption both in their buildings and among their congregants, in their homes.

Kevin Flynn, MPP for Oakville and parliamentary secretary to the minister of energy, presented a cheque for $35,000 to Faith & the Common Good at last week's meeting. "Today's workshop is a significant step in a long-term process that will ensure every church, temple and mosque in Ontario becomes as energy-efficient as possible," he said.

Faith & the Common Good has been subsidizing energy audits for buildings, which identify possible savings, but it asks participating institutions to contribute an equal amount of money in retrofits, O'Brien said.

"We're trying to get faith communities to have an energy audit done," said O'Brien, adding that sometimes people can do them on their own "in a very cursory way."

A professional audit runs between $2,000 and $4,000 and can be facilitated through the Greening Sacred Spaces program by Green Communities Canada, which has been involved in the federal government's EnerGuide for Houses program.

Faith buildings are "notoriously energy inefficient," said O'Brien. It often takes "an incredible amount of oil or gas" to heat their "cavernous" spaces.

"With the right kind of conservation, they can save a lot of money and a lot of greenhouse gases from going into the atmosphere," he said.

Retrofits such as switching to compact fluorescent light bulbs, upgrading to a high-efficiency furnace, and draft-proofing can result in savings of 20 to 40 per cent per year, he said.

"What we do in our places of worship should really reflect our best ideals," said Rachel Melzer, chair of social action at the First Narayever Congregation in downtown Toronto. The congregation has occupied its present building since 1940.

The synagogue, which has between 400 and 500 members and is featured in a Greening Sacred Spaces film, has undertaken retrofits over the years that include new windows, some energy-efficient light bulbs, and timers on its heating and cooling systems, Melzer said. It also uses glass plates and metal cutlery instead of disposables, has a composter on site, and has published suggestions in its bulletin about ways congregants can make a difference in their homes. Ever since a November meeting on energy conservation, new ideas have been "pouring in," said Melzer.

A great endeavour together

From the editor's desk

Every now and then, very rarely though, certain human events transcend history. In a manner other than the advance of scientific process, they change things permanently for subsequent generations.

Forty years ago, the soldiers of Israel fought for their lives and for the life of their young, 19-year-old country in a war that would come to be known as the Six Day War. During that war, they captured the eastern part of the city of Jerusalem, which the Jordanian army had severed from the western part in 1948.

Rare was the Jew who didn't react with tears and goosebumps when he heard paratroop commander Motta Gur report back to his commanders "Har Habayit b'yadeinu." ("The Temple Mount is in our hands.")

The "our" of that proclamation, of course, was the "our" of the sovereign Jewish State of Israel. For the first time in some 1,900 years, the Temple Mount, and with it the last remaining remnant of the Second Temple – the outer retaining wall of the temple, more specifically the visible portion of the Western (retaining) Wall – was once again under the jurisdictional control of Jews.

The day the barriers were brought down, the 28th day of the month of Iyar in the Jewish calendar, was a transcendent moment in Jewish and world history. It changed the course of history.

The 40th anniversary of that moment will be celebrated worldwide on May 16.

In anticipation of that celebration, The CJN was a guest in Jerusalem of the Jerusalem Foundation, the independent, non-profit organization with offices around the world dedicated to the diverse peoples and beauteous precincts of the city of Jerusalem.

Founded in 1966 by the venerable and visionary mayor of the city, the late Teddy Kollek, the Jerusalem Foundation became the central instrument in helping to build and shape the newly unified city. It continues to do so to this very day.

"We created an opportunity for Jews and non-Jews from around the world to play a significant role in shaping Jerusalem's future," Kollek said.

The future that Kollek foresaw for the city was a capital of Israel that was open, deferential to the cultural, religious, ethnic, linguistic and other differences of its many peoples, respectful of its past, nurturing of its future, a haven of educational opportunities, safe, green, expansive, pluralistic, tolerant and forever beautiful.

Since its founding 40 years ago, the foundation has raised more than $1 billion (US) from donors around the world and disbursed those funds in some 3,000 projects and tens of thousands of grants, all of which are aimed at building the city in the very broadest sense of the term.

"The Jerusalem Foundation is the driving force for the building of the city. The municipality cannot do it alone," Steve Solomon, the director of the foundation's Canada desk in Jerusalem, told a small group of visiting journalists last week.

There was palpable electricity in the air when the former Montrealer spoke of Jerusalem and of the work of the foundation. The 50-ish, silver-haired Jerusalem enthusiast was the group's guide and leader for a much-too-short, yet still-exhausting, five-day familiarization tour of some of the foundation's projects in the city. His voice invariably crackled with sparks of love for the eternal city as he spoke of the community building in which he was able to participate.

"Working for the foundation allows me to bask in the feeling that in everything I do, I am doing mitzvah work," Solomon told The CJN.

"Whether it helps repair a street, stock a library or feed the hungry, I feel very much that my personal decisions are part of Jewish history," he said.

The projects of the foundation fall within six broad categories: educational equality; tolerance and coexistence; arts and culture; social, health and community services; parks and recreation; and preservation and heritage.

Yet, despite the breadth and scope of the many activities undertaken or partially funded by the foundation, there is an over-riding focus to its work.

"In everything we do," said Ruth Cheshin, the foundation's president, "we have our eyes on coexistence. Every project also serves this purpose." By coexistence, she meant between Jew and Jew as well as between Arab and Jew.

Time and again, as our group walked, bused and cabbed through the enchanted streets of Jerusalem, we were told to "look at the faces of the people." It is for them that the foundation exists.

Referring to a recent essay in The Economist, which suggested that a large portion of the Jewish Diaspora was increasingly alienated from Israel, Alan Freeman, the vice-president of overseas coordination, plaintively asked: "Are we on a great endeavour together?"

The return nearly 60 years ago of the Jewish people to sovereign history and the reunification some 40 years ago of its ancient capital requires us to answer Freeman's more-than-rhetorical question in the absolute, unhesitating affirmative.

Over the course of the next few weeks, I will write about some of the projects of the Jerusalem Foundation that we saw and the effect of the tour on some of my fellow travellers who were seeing Jerusalem for the first time.

Jewish environmental group seeks volunteers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ahuva Goldshmidt says she's overwhelmed by the positive response she has received about creating "a community greening network."

The executive director of Torat HaTeva, an organization that promotes environmental awareness and stewardship, said it was evident at a meeting of potential volunteers earlier this month hosted by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education that "everyone shared a strong passion… for creating a strong, viable environmental network in the Greater Toronto Area."

Shai Spetgang

Goldshmidt said she is seeking other "eco-Jews" to work together in groups in order to focus on such efforts as education, action projects such as tree planting, and fundraising.

She also wants to "green" community buildings, a project that includes conserving water and energy, and co-ordinating initiatives such as carpooling. She has approached other community organizations to work in collaboration with her group to reach this goal.

"We could say we've reached a critical mass. We had to turn people away from the meeting, and every one of the 40 people present signed on to help."

In the long-term, she says, she envisions creating a Jewish nature centre at the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

"This would serve the [both the Jewish and the larger community] and would include organic gardening, hiking trails, and educational projects."

Shai Spetgang, chair of Torat HaTeva, said at the BJE meeting that the group's interest in the environment has a basis in Judaism.

"[One of our mitzvot] states not to [take part] in wanton destruction. The sub-point to this is to recycle and compost."

Goldshmidt, who said she is working "more than full time" for Torat Ha Teva, said there have always been people in the community interested in environmental issues, but until now, there has been no central volunteer organization.

"A [group] of people has the capacity to do something and my role was to put this group together."

She would like to see things move ahead quickly, she says, "because it would be a shame to lose the momentum."

A psychology graduate, Goldshmidt says she has always been interested in the environment.

She said that in 2004, while participating in an annual bike ride in New York state sponsored by Hazon, an organization that promotes outdoor and environmental education in the Jewish community, she met a number of other environmentalists who were "discovering and rediscovering their connection to nature. For me, nature has always been an unbelievable source of strength."

She hopes that representatives from Torat HaTeva will participate in this year's ride.

She said learned about the value of nature-based organizations while volunteering at such agencies as Outward Bound and Earth Rangers, and while interning at Camp Isabella Freedman in Connecticut, home of the Teva Learning Centre, which offers students programs that combine ecology, Jewish environmental ethics, and environmental activism.

While at the camp, she said, she was surprised to meet a number of other Torontonians, "and we had a moment. We realized we had to create a network.

"We are all drawn to the ideal of living in a way that will impact the world. The energy I drew from all these people inspired me."

She says that Torat Ha Teva is holding its annual Tu b'Shvat seder on Feb. 3 at Anshei Minsk Congregation, 10 St. Andrews St. The evening features the seder, drumming, organic fruit and refreshments.

Eisen optimistic about Conservative Judaism's future

The Conservative movement has not always succeeded "in articulating or communicating a clear message about what it means to be a Conservative Jew," Eisen said.

"The job is to make a statement about what Conservative Judaism means that is clear, compelling, and can persuade people – at a time we disagree about important things – that the things we agree about are broader and deeper than the things we disagree about."

Eisen stressed the importance of demonstrating "real mutual respect," referring to pluralism not only within the movement, but within the greater Jewish community, and between Jews and non-Jews.

He said that pluralism does not mean "anything goes." Instead, he explained, it means that "you recognize a certain range of opinions, and agree to respect people who disagree with you."

Although he didn't mention it specifically when talking about pluralism, the December 2006 vote by the Rabbinical Assembly's committee on Jewish law and standards (the movement's authority on Halachah, or Jewish law) about homosexuality has been a high-profile area of controversy.

The committee endorsed conflicting rabbinic opinions on the issue, one of which allows same-sex commitment ceremonies and ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis. JTS has yet to make a decision on whether to admit openly gay or lesbian students to its rabbinical seminary, but it's expected to decide within the next few months, Eisen said near the end of a question-and-answer period.

Other areas of difference in the Conservative movement include the use of musical instruments on Shabbat, as well as egalitarianism. Some 92 per cent of American Conservative synagogues call themselves egalitarian, compared to only 20 per cent of Canadian ones, according to Eisen.

Eisen, a scholar of modern Judaism who is completing his 21st year teaching at Stanford University before officially starting his job as JTS chancellor in July, attributes his optimism about the future of Conservative Judaism in part to the "quality" issue. "If we were performing at maximum effectiveness and still losing people, then I'd really be scared.

"What we are doing well in some places, we can do well in other places," he said.

Referring to the loss of "some of the best and brightest of [Conservative] youth to Orthodoxy, because of the experience of davening and learning at Ramah or in Israel that they can't find in their Conservative synagogues," Eisen said that "the Jewish people will not be the loser if [young people] go to Orthodoxy. The Conservative movement, however, will be the loser."

> 'We have something different to offer, something precious to offer'

The issue was of concern to at least two of an estimated 130 audience members, who raised it in a question-and-answer session after the talk. Both have children who have left the movement to become Orthodox.

Eisen said he wants to provide young people with an intensive davening and learning experience in the context of Conservative Judaism. "We have something different to offer, something precious to offer."

Also, he noted, Orthodoxy need not have a monopoly on tight communities. Conservative Judaism needs to provide community, charismatic teachers and "content" that hits young people "where they are with what they need at that moment," he said. "We need better kinds of outreach."

Referring to the third area, "structure," Eisen said the different arms of Conservative Judaism need to work more effectively together. "We have to change the way we do business at a time of Internet, of unparalleled mobility, of challenges and rapidity of change like none other in history."

Eisen believes that JTS has several roles to play, not just with respect to its own Conservative constituency, but all over North America. In an age when religious Americans are increasingly fundamentalist or evangelical, he said, "we need this in-between [place]."

JTS, he added, also has a responsibility to use its connection with the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies (its counterpart in Israel) to strengthen Israeli-Diaspora relations and connections between Jews and Judaism.

During his year as chancellor-elect, Eisen is travelling to North American Conservative communities and is also seeking input via the JTS website (at www.jtsa.edu/progs/phi/areisen/facon.shtml). Although he has already received hundreds of e-mails, he said he will not "make any definitive pronouncement on what the direction of Conservative Judaism should be until after we finish gathering these opinions."

Strong support that must be praised

Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay visited Israel and the Middle East region for the first time ever last week. His schedule was very busy. As CJN correspondent Jenny Hazan reports, the minister met with his Israeli counterpart Tzipi Livni, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit. He also found time to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem, the Canada Centre in Metulla and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency satellite in Bethlehem.

His busy schedule notwithstanding, it was his dignified comportment that was indeed very impressive and provided ample hope and evidence that the minister will be able to navigate the jostling political entanglements and policy snarls of the always complicated nuances of Mideast diplomacy to stand firm, finally, on matters of principle and conscience.

And it was his unambiguous, forthright assertion of plain and simple propositions at the Herzliya Conference that deserves high praise. He articulated the government's longstanding view that "Palestinians need a state, Israel needs security, and the two are intricately linked." But he elaborated. These were not platitudes aimed at equal appeal. "Without the Palestinians assuming responsibility for security internally, and by extension, offering security to their neighbour Israel, progress will not be possible. Fatah reform has to be a top priority."

He also refused to meet with Hamas, because to do so would be to violate the Canadian commitment not to support terrorists, and would make a mockery of Canada's participation and sacrifice in Afghanistan.

"Six decades have passed, and Canada's support for Israel has become even stronger… Canada continues to understand the significance and importance of Israel, both as an idea and as a state" (editorial emphasis). And then, in a remarkable public statement of confession, the foreign minister said: "However, our record is not unblemished. We were among those who turned our backs on Jews fleeing the Holocaust. But we have learned from our mistakes."

One of those mistakes, we hold, is that Canada must never again acquiesce or seem indifferent in the face of threatened genocide. And thus he also said the following: "Canada is deeply concerned with the direction Iran is heading in. With no doubt that Israel would be [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's first target… the regime in Iran cannot be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons.

"We will speak out and speak loudly for Israel to be treated as an equal nation in the international community – when and where, we will be there. Canada has stood and will stand shoulder-to-shoulder with Israel, and we will continue to do so."

Shoulder-to-shoulder with Israel these days means helping mobilize a worldwide coalition to stop a nuclear Iran.

25 years ago in The CJN

During a visit to Canada, the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization, Leon Dulzin, told a Montreal audience that Israel and Jews worldwide should make the aliyah of Soviet Jews a priority and relaunch the campaign to win their freedom. He said the Jewish Agency had affidavits from 400,000 Soviet Jews who wished to emigrate.

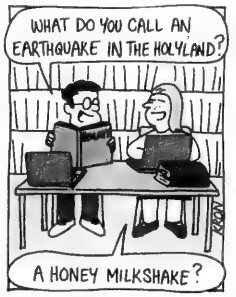
Phony refugee claimants

From 1972, when I and others organized Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for Soviet Jewry, we argued that according to Soviet law, Jews were entitled to immigrate to Israel and if they chose not to, to be permitted to practise their religion without harassment and persecution. Eventually, pressures on the Soviet government from our groups and others resulted in a lifting of restrictions and many Jews were allowed to leave for Israel. A debate developed in the Diaspora as to whether Jews who were permitted to leave the Soviet Union should opt out and go to countries other than Israel. That issue was eventually resolved on the basis that as long as Soviet Jews found freedom, it mattered not where they settled. The vast number of Soviet Jews integrated into life in Israel, and others found new and rewarding lives in countries such as Canada.



The article "Asylum seekers 'deliberately mislead'" (CJN Jan. 18) is most disturbing not because former Soviet citizens are claiming refugee status here in Canada alleging discrimination, harassment and economic disadvantage but rather because the Immigration and Refugee Board finds credibility in these complaints. Israel is a flourishing democracy with human rights commissions and courts that uphold the rule of law. If these phony refugee claimants were sent back to Israel, they would not face torture or imprisonment, but could vent their concerns before the appropriate legal institution. It is preposterous that the IRB lists Israel where refugee protection is sought along with countries like China, Haiti, Sri Lanka and Nigeria.

Jihadist conflicts trigger domino effect

The war raging against jihadists and Al Qaeda in Somalia attracted U.S. aid in the form of air strikes by AC-130 aircraft in support of the Ethiopian liberation armies. According to reports, the targets of the U.S. strike in Somalia were Al Qaeda leaders, including those responsible for the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, which killed more than 200 people.

A feudal culture of tribal vendettas that has long plagued the Muslim world from Indonesia to Turkey is spreading to the West. It's an archaic culture in which the gun is still the favoured instrument of the electoral process. Will the West always be vexed and blamed for these bitter conflicts?

We should be prepared for the domino effect being triggered by these jihadist conflicts as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad threatens annihilation of those who oppose him and strives to champion an Islamist empire. He is fomenting enough heat to cause the downfall of the more balanced nations in the Middle East.

The curved blade will turn back on its handler. Will Israel ally itself with the Saudis, Jordan, Egypt and Turkey, who also fear this oligarchy?

Beth Tzedec Out of the Cold program

For the past five years, Beth Tzedec Congregation has been a more than equal partner with Beth Sholom Synagogue in a joint Out of the Cold program ("Synagogues warm up winter for the homeless," CJN, Jan. 25). Our cooperation extends to every aspect of this endeavour, except venue. Our chesed committee chairs, under my leadership from Beth Tzedec and that of Paul Price from Beth Sholom, began this joint venture in an effort to share resources, organizational skills and volunteers while connecting our two shuls in the fulfilment of the mitzvah to feed the hungry.

More than 100 Beth Tzedec volunteers participate in this worthy endeavour. Visit on any given Tuesday night and you will find the current chesed chair of Beth Tzedec, Margaret Weinstein, working triple shifts. Come by at 5 a.m. the following morning and you will probably find our very own Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl serving up eggs and bagels for breakfast.

The space at Beth Sholom is very graciously given, but without the joint participation of Beth Tzedec members, there would be no Out of the Cold program.

Iran cannot be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons

The following is the address given Jan. 24 by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the 2007 Herzliya Conference on Israel's national security.

I cannot speak tonight without referring to the events of the past day and the attorney general's decision to hold a hearing for the president in light of the possibility that serious charges may be filed against him. In these circumstances, I have no doubt that the president cannot continue to fulfil his role and he should leave the President's Residence. This is a sad day for the State of Israel.

Exactly one year ago less one day, I had the privilege to stand at this podium, at the final session of the Herzliya Conference, as acting prime minister, in place of Ariel Sharon, who days earlier had fallen into a coma from which he has yet to awaken. In that speech, I expressed my profound prayer, and that of all those present, as well as the entire nation, that Arik Sharon would return to us. I have carried this hope and this prayer since then.

Today, I would like to focus on a subject that I believe is the most important one, and that was one of the main points of discussion during this conference over the past few days. This subject is one with significant repercussions for the State of Israel and the region in the next decade. I will present you with a report on the state of the Iranian threat.

Today, there is not one among us who does not sense the dangers inherent in this threat, not only to Israel, but also to the future of the region and to the stability of the world order.

Every Israeli government over the past decade has acted vigorously to improve our ability to track Iran's intentions, increase international awareness of the threat, mobilize international support to stop external assistance of the Iranian plans and prepare appropriate options in the event that these efforts prove unsuccessful in the end.

We achieved considerable accomplishments in each of these areas; however, let us not delude ourselves: the primary goal which must be realized still lies ahead.

For many long years, we have followed Iran's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons in the guise of a civilian nuclear program. They are working through secret channels in a number of sites spread out across Iran. In the past few years, we have been witness to especially intense Iranian activity on two tracks – the overt and the covert.

Iranian support of Palestinian terror – through financial support, provision of weapons and knowledge, both directly and through Syria – Iranian assistance of terror in Iraq, exposure of the capabilities that reached Hezbollah from Iran during the fighting in Lebanon and the assistance which they offered just recently to Hamas, have demonstrated to many the seriousness of the Iranian threat.

This activity has created an opposing front, which includes, in varying intensities, all the permanent members of the UN Security Council: Arab states such as Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, Egypt and Jordan, and other key countries in the West, such as Germany and Japan. This front is acting to unite forces and prevent this threat from becoming a reality.

Recently, I returned from an important visit to China, and thus ended a round of diplomatic visits. I met with all the leaders of countries that serve as permanent members of the Security Council, and other key countries. The Iranian topic was at the top of our agenda and at the core of the meetings I held, and of those that various ministers and other professional officials regularly hold.

In all the contacts I have had, there has been clear agreement that Iran cannot be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons or the material to produce them.

The Security Council's discussion of the Iranian situation and its acceptance of Resolution 1737 are important steps, which brought together all the members of the Security Council. The resolution was achieved following intense and complex diplomatic efforts. Many parties took part in it, including several agencies in the State of Israel, both at a political level and at a professional level. We know that our efforts contributed greatly to the result.

It is clear to everyone that a diplomatic solution to the Iranian issue is the preferred solution. We also prefer such an outcome. The direction which the majority of the international community leans toward is a solution that can bear fruit, as long as it is done with the necessary ingenuity and determination, while meticulously adhering to the minimum requirements on which there can be no compromise.

Assuming that all the steps which will now be taken (and those which are already being taken) by the international community are sharper, more significant, clearer and more vigorous, the need to adopt more demanding and harsher solutions in the future will be reduced. Those who believe, as we do, that a diplomatic solution is preferable, must now muster their strength to exert pressure on Iran and stay the course until change is achieved.

If we turn a blind eye now, while ignoring reality, dragging our feet and attempting to reach dangerous compromises while avoiding taking clear steps, those of us who wish to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear power will, down the road, not be left with any choice but to take much more severe steps in the future.

I wish to clarify – Iran is very vulnerable and sensitive to international pressure, despite its defiant, arrogant and provocative stance, and it is already paying the ever-increasing price of this behaviour, a price which will only increase if it continues in its policy. As serious as the Iranian threat is, the threat of nuclear attack on Israel is by no means imminent.

At this stage, there is still time, while not unlimited, to stop Iran's intention of becoming a nuclear power that threatens its adversaries – first and foremost, Israel. We are not complacent, we cannot be complacent, and we are responding to the Iranian threats with the necessary seriousness.

Israel is not spearheading the struggle against the Iranian threat. This threat must be dealt with seriously and responsibly, first and foremost by the major powers and by other key nations.

We are at the forefront of the fight to place this issue at the top of the agendas of world leaders and international public opinion. It is our duty to point out the dangers and help in finding solutions.

The Jewish people, on whom the scars of the Holocaust are deeply etched, cannot allow itself to again face a threat against its very existence. In the past, the world remained silent, and the results are known. Our role is to prevent the world from repeating this mistake.

This is a moral question of the highest degree. There is a moment during which any rule among the routine diplomatic rules becomes irrelevant. When the leader of a country announces, officially and publicly, his country's intention to wipe off the map another country, and creates those tools that will allow him to realize his stated threat, no nation has the right to weigh its position on the matter. This is an obligation of the highest order, to act with all force against this plot.

We have nothing against the Iranian people, we are not the enemy of the Iranian people and we have no interest in conflict with Iran. In the past, before the takeover by the radical factions of the country, with its exceptional tradition and impressive abilities, we had close and friendly relations.

The Iran of today, whose leadership is motivated by religious fanaticism and ideological extremism, has chosen a policy of confrontation with us, and threatens to wipe Israel off the map of nations. It supports terror and undermines stability in the region. The Iranian regime, in its aspiration to regional hegemony, bears responsibility for the riots perpetrated by the Hezbollah today to bring down the Lebanese government.

Threats, hostility and fighting are not our way. Our aspiration was, and will always be, to live in peace with our neighbours, near and far. We will never reject a hand offered in all sincerity towards genuine peace, by any nation. For this we yearn.

At the same time, our desire for peace should not be interpreted as weakness, but rather as a source of strength. Anyone who threatens us, who threatens our existence, must know that we have the determination and capability of defending ourselves, responding with force, discretion and with all the means at our disposal as necessary. We will not place the lives of our people, the life of our country, at risk.

We have the right to full freedom of action to act in defence of our vital interests. We will not hesitate to use it. I do not suggest that anyone mistakes our restraint and responsibility, or presume that it will harm our determination and capability to act when necessary.

The Iranian issue preoccupies me and my thoughts constantly. I am co-ordinating the handling of this matter and follow up on it on a daily basis, of one mind with the ministers involved in the matter and in co-ordination with the relevant agencies and ministries.

Faced with the Iranian threat, there is not, never was and will never be, any difference between opposition and coalition, between right, centre and left. We are all united in this regard, and the people stand behind us, united and ready to face the dangers lurking at Israel's doorstep.

There is no human experience we have not undergone. There is no affliction, threat, hatred, jealousy, envy, persecution, violence and bloodshed which have not been seared into our flesh. With unparalleled strength, we built our lives and established a glorious country.

No force in the world can destroy us – and there will never be. We refuse to be dragged into an atmosphere of collective, self-induced fear. We will not allow the people to sink into depression and insecurity. We have immense strength. We have nothing to fear and we will not be afraid.

All of us understand the weight of responsibility and the importance of the hour related to this sensitive subject. Together, through joint internal effort, by joining forces with the world and by speaking in one responsible voice at home – not overly excited, but rather clear and determined – we will stand up to nuclear threats and prevail.

Opinions

Indifference is a killer

Have you ever wondered if you could be a hero? Generally, heroes are tested in crisis and war. They usually don't have split-level homes, mortgages and RRSP's.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But even those of us with boring bourgeois lives can save lives. By taking a simple cheek swab, we can vault into the pantheon of life-saving heroes. Registering in the Gift of Life Registry puts you into a database of potential bone marrow donors who can save the lives of patients fighting leukemia and lymphoma.

Remarkably, it's a struggle to get people to register. Even when presented with an opportunity for effortless heroism, many people still look the other way. And unfortunately, because of this indifference, lives will not be saved. Simply put, indifference is a killer.

What makes people so indifferent? Community does. When more than one person can assume responsibility for something, each one mentally shifts responsibility to the others. The Talmud notes that "a pot of partners is neither hot nor cold" (i.e. the pot is neglected), and each partner assumes the other one will take the initiative to heat the food for the meal, or cool the food for storage. In a community setting, it's easy to dump responsibility on "someone else."

Sociologists call this type of apathy the "bystander effect." Good people rely on others to respond and don't bother to get involved. The indifference can be deadly. In the famous 1964 Kitty Genovese murder in Kew Gardens, New York, Kitty's neighbours heard her scream for help but did nothing. Each bystander assumed someone else had already called the police.

The evil produced by indifference is enormous. On the world stage, genocide is ignored, because it's another country's responsibility. As Jews, we remember how the Allies closed their doors to Jewish immigration before World War II, and did virtually nothing to stop the Holocaust. Today, a genocide is taking place in the Darfur region of Sudan, and the world sits idly by. As the English statesman-philosopher Edmund Burke put it: "The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing."

Heroism doesn't require a military conflagration or international crisis. To become a real hero, the first thing you have to do is shake off indifference. You have to be willing to accept the community's responsibility as your own and step up to the plate.

A Gift of Life donor drive is taking place in Montreal on Sunday, Feb. 18, at the Federation CJA building. Among the patients seeking bone marrow transplants is Amy Katz, a beautiful, sweet 13-year-old from Pittsburgh. A few minutes of your time can save her life.

Will you be indifferent, or will you be a hero? Amy's life depends on your answer.

Memo to a useful idiot

Dear Shulamit Aloni,

In early January, you supported former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's inaccurate, inflammatory accusation that Israel is guilty of practising "apartheid." You must be pleased with yourself. Your article has been widely posted around the Internet. Googling "Shulamit Aloni" and "apartheid" generates 70,000 hits.

Gil Troy in Montreal

I am, however, appalled. Not only did you fail to make the case, but I challenge you to see how your article is being used. I do not believe that all critics of Israel are anti-Semites. Nor do all critics call for Israel's destruction. But I wonder how many anti-Semites – how many people devoted to destroying Israel – will post your article and lovingly quote your words before you take responsibility for fanning the flames of hatred against your people and the country you served as education minister.

You repeated the term apartheid nine times in your nearly 1,100-word article, yet only one paragraph discusses the term. Citing international law, you define apartheid "as an international crime that, among other things, includes using different legal instruments to rule over different racial groups, thus depriving people of their human rights." Having shown that Israeli soldiers disrupt Palestinian travel you ask: "Isn't freedom of travel one of these rights?"

That's the wrong question. The relevant question is whether the Israeli-Palestinian clash is a racial conflict and whether the State of Israel has imposed a systematic, racist South-African-type regime. You contradict your title when you say that "we, too, used very violent terror against foreign rule because we wanted our own state." If Palestinians are fighting "foreign rulers" then how is the apartheid label relevant? Apartheid, with its network of laws separating black citizens from whites, institutionalized white supremacy. Neither you nor Carter have justified that charge.

Unfortunately, this is more than a legalistic debate. By supporting Carter's term, you are advancing a growing worldwide campaign to delegitimize Zionism and expel Israel from among the community of nations, which is the correct punishment for an "apartheid" state. Your article – and your career – demonstrate many other eloquent ways to condemn Israeli policies without using an incorrect, destructive analogy.

If you doubt how the apartheid accusation is being used against Israel, I invite you to surf the web and meet your new allies.

When I appeared on the left-leaning American radio and television network Democracy Now to condemn Carter's use of the term, I received a wave of abusive anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic e-mails. Most critics blamed Israel exclusively for the entire Mideast mess, putting Israel's actions and "the Jews" at the centre of all the world's troubles.

I was told that the Jewish state should be in southern Germany, not on Palestinian land, that we Jews thought we were better than everyone, and that as a "Jewish New Yorker" I spoke "Yinglish" not English. Most critics triumphantly referenced your article or other similar articles from Israelis "proving" that Israel practises apartheid – as if it's impossible for an Israeli to be wrong, too.

You are, of course, free to believe what you wish and write what you wish. That's your right. You live in a free county. But had you lived under South Africa's apartheid regime, you would have had to write such attacks from outside the country or from inside a jail cell.

My question then, is, what is your responsibility? When your words, consistently, are used by others to smear Israel, to delegitimize the state, to rationalize terrorism, and to peddle anti-Semitism, at what point do those actions implicate you?

The time has come for you to stand up and say, "Yes, my anger about the situation in the territories remains but, no, don't delegimitize my state, don't libel my people, and don't use my heartfelt words to advance your despicable agenda." You and many of your comrades on the Israeli left seem to have forgotten that in the Internet age, your words resonate, making you foot soldiers in the "electronic intifadah" that seeks Israel's destruction. I challenge you and your buddies to take responsibility for the anti-Semitic effects of some of your rhetoric. You cannot deny your impact.

The old saw falsely attributed to Lenin still holds – you don't have to recognize that you're a "useful idiot" to be one.

Other minorities can learn from Jews

This month marks the 200th anniversary of the first meeting of the modern Grand Sanhedrin, a high Jewish court convened at the order of the emperor Napoleon.

The meeting of the Grand Sanhedrin was the culmination of a process that began with the French Revolution of 1789. The Revolution marked the height of the French Enlightenment and the beginning of the emancipation of the European Jew. French liberals argued for according the full rights of citizenship to France's native Jews, starting a modern movement that spread to other European nations. The ideals of the Enlightenment shaped North American ideas about citizenship, human rights, and difference.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

But French activists and thinkers worried about integrating Jews into French society as equals. They wondered whether Jews would have dual loyalties – to the Jewish nation and to the French nation – that might put them into conflict. If so, Jews could not be relied upon as citizens. Instead, if accorded full rights, they might prove a subversive and dangerous element.

In a speech that has become famous for setting the terms by which liberal democracies would regard minority cultures, a French nobleman insisted that if the French Republic is to be consistent with its own principles of equality and human rights, it must grant equal rights to French Jews. Count Stanislas de Clermont Tonnerre argued that Jews must be granted citizenship as individuals, but that their national loyalty must be to France alone.

Citizenship was a public and collective commitment, shared not with other Jews as such, but with all Frenchmen. As a non-nation, French Jews might be integrated into the French nation-state. This distinction between private and public life, and between personal and national identity, became the standard way of the thinking about not only Jews, but all minorities, in modern democratic countries.

In an 1806 exchange between Napoleon and a group of Jewish dignitaries, the Assembly of Jewish Notables that convened upon his orders, the emperor posed a series of questions designed to address elements of Jewish citizenship and dual loyalties. He wanted reassurance, for example, that in matters of marriage and divorce – highly regulated matters during his rule – French law would prevail. He also asked whether Jews would defend France on the battlefield, and whether Jews considered themselves part of the French nation. These issues were a touchstone to matters of Jewish loyalty. They also made the distinction between the private and public spheres, and between the domestic and the civic realms, less distinct.

The Assembly of Jewish Notables, and the Grand Sanhedrin that picked up its mandate, walked a fine line, offering reassurances of Jewish loyalty to the country without negating the rights of Jews to practice Judaism.

Canadian Jews owe our place as Jews in Canadian culture today to the the 1807 Sanhedrin. At the same time, many of the tensions that riddled French Jews 200 years ago are still pressure points today: the boundaries between acculturation and assimilation, or between uniquely Jewish values and Canadian values; the conflicting desires to fit in and stand out as distinct; the elasticity of the country in accommodating difference among its citizenry; and the adaptability of minorities to Canadian norms and ideals.

In our own country today, Jews aren't unique in grappling with these issues. Other religious, ethnic and heritage groups navigate these vexing issues, which are inherent to diverse, democratic countries.

By now, the Jews of the West carry 200 years of experience in exploring and negotiating these issues. Our own historical moment in the West is as fraught, however, as the moment when Napoleon's Grand Sanhedrin first convened. Not only Jews, but other groups – particularly Muslims in the West – face questions that have confronted Jews for ages: headcoverings in public places, different clothing, different foods, integration, self-definition, and so on.

Sometimes, my students – across religious and ethnic divides – are struck by the resonances of the Jewish experience for different groups today. To what extent might the experience of Jews serve as a model for a wide range of other groups struggling with similar issues today? I like to think that an intercultural dialogue about integration and difference in democracies might be a fruitful move toward understanding.

The Kirshner File

Nazi propaganda shaped German opinion

As World War II raged, the Nazi propaganda machine, directed by Josef Goebbels, bombarded the German public with a paranoid narrative of the fighting and a justification of the anti-Semitic measures Germany was taking against Jews in Europe. In a relentless media campaign in which the big lie technique was perfected to a fine art, the Nazis claimed that the extermination of the Jews was a justified response to a war launched by "international Jewry."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Jeffrey Herf, a University of Maryland historian, examines this pivotal subject in a first-rate book, The Jewish Enemy: Nazi Propaganda During World War II and the Holocaust (Harvard University Press), which won the 2006 National Jewish Book Award in the Holocaust category.

It is no secret that the Nazi regime exploited age-old anti-Semitism to shape opinion in Germany and elsewhere. But Herf's volume, drawing on primary and secondary sources, goes beyond the obvious and documents the extent to which the resources of the state were mobilized to impose what Herf describes as "a paranoiac pattern on world events." In this respect, The Jewish Enemy is the first book, in English at least, to comprehensively deal with this important topic.

The Nazi thesis, bought hook, line and sinker by the majority of Germans, was that Jews were guilty of starting and prolonging the war, and that a Jewish conspiracy was intent on wiping out Germany and Germans. Seen from this distorted and twisted perspective, the genocide of the Jews was conveniently regarded as a war of retaliation and defence.

The radical, race-based anti-Semitism disseminated by Adolf Hitler and his cohorts rested on the assumption that Jews were a cohesive, politically active group loyal to no nation state, and that this powerful and autonomous entity, international Jewry, manipulated and controlled stooges and accomplices who served its interests. Proceeding from this theory, already popularized by The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Russian tract, the Nazis spoke of a global Jewish conspiracy to attain power and exterminate the Germans.

No sooner had Hitler been appointed chancellor than he embarked on a quest to destroy the free press and thus shape popular opinion. Two thousand journalists, including Jews, liberals, conservatives and communists, were driven from their jobs, arrested or forced into exile, while 200 Social Democratic and 35 Communist newspapers were summarily closed. Meanwhile, the Nazis bought various newspapers and periodicals, often at bargain-basement prices, and merged major press services under their supervision. Newspapers that remained privately owned were subjected to rigid censorship. In Herf's words, the German press became "a state monopoly."

Two months after attaining the chancellorship in January 1933, Hitler placed Goebbels – who held a PhD in German literature from the University of Heidelberg and had been editor of the Nazi weekly Der Angriff – at the head of the newly-created Ministry of Propaganda. By 1939, his ministry included departments for the domestic press, the foreign press, radio, film, theatre and music.

Within the ministry, a functionary named Eberhard Taubert produced much of the anti-Semitic propaganda aimed at Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, while a Nazi ideologue, Alfred Rosenberg, managed the affairs of the Institute for the Study of the Jewish Question.

In addition, the ministry was responsible for the graphically vivid wall newspaper Word of the Week, which appeared on walls, kiosks and specially designed glass-fronted boxes. According to Herf, it was the most intrusive and pervasive form of visual propaganda in everyday life in Germany.

Though immensely powerful, Goebbels was not the sole top-level figure in charge of propaganda. His rival, Otto Dietrich, administered the Reich Press Office, which laid down the party line on breaking events in Germany and abroad. Dietrich also briefed Hitler on the news of the day every morning.

The national daily of the Nazi party, Der Volkische Beobachter, which was edited by Rosenberg from 1923 until 1938, was a key component in Germany's anti-Semitic campaigns. By 1944, its circulation was about 1.7 million per day. By contrast, Julius Streicher's anti-Semitic organ, Der Sturmer, had a fairly modest circulation of 400,000.

Hitler, on Jan. 30, 1939, presented what Herf casts as "the core Nazi narrative of the coming conflict." In his annual speech to the Reichstag, eight months before Germany's invasion of Poland, he warned: "I want today to be a prophet again: if international finance Jewry inside and outside Europe should succeed in plunging the nations once more into a world war, the result will not be the Bolshevization of the earth and therefore the victory of Jewry, but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."

Hitler repeated this threat, which was broadcast on radio and published in the press, on four subsequent occasions.

Another enduring theme in the Nazi playbook was the affinity between Jews and Britain. Peter Aldag's two-volume work, Jews in England, published in the year the war broke out, established the tone of this particular campaign. In short, Aldag wrote of the bond connecting Jews with the Church of England, the monarchy and Puritanism.

A Nazi anti-Semitic poster, circa 1943, says, "He bears guilt for the war."

Nazi propaganda, too, attempted to stir up anti-Semitism in the United States, contrasting president Franklin Roosevelt's Jewish "brain trust" and the Hollywood film industry with "real" Americans. More often than not, Roosevelt was portrayed as a Jew.

With Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, Nazi propaganda harped once again on the alliance between Bolshevism and Jews. A pamphlet, Germany has Entered the Fight to the Finish with the Jewish-Bolshevik System of Murder, was widely distributed to local party leaders.

The regime promoted anti-Zionism as well. Rosenberg, in an essay first published in 1921 and reissued in 1938, contemptuously argued that Jews were incapable of statecraft. But in the midst of the war, Hitler's contention that a Jewish state in Palestine would be a base for the international Jewish conspiracy displaced Rosenberg's dismissal of Zionism.

Viewing Muslims as possible allies, Nazi propagandists let it be known, in June 1939, that the term "anti-Semitism" should be dropped in reference to Arabs and replaced by expressions such as "defence against Jews" and "hostility to the Jews."

The Nazis cultivated the grand mufti of Jerusalem, Amin al-Husseini, who lived in Berlin during the war. In Arabic broadcasts on German radio, Al-Husseini attacked "Jewish influence in America" and called on Arabs to back the Axis powers. He also worked to establish an SS division of Muslims from Bosnia and, in a 1944 letter to SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler, noted the "parallels" between Nazism and Islam and urged him "to do what was necessary to prevent the wandering of Jews to Palestine."

This, of course, was code language for genocide. Although the Nazis made sure that not a single fact about the Holocaust ever appeared in German newspapers and magazines, Goebbels alluded to his support for the mass murder of Jews in a November 1941 edition of Das Reich – the political and cultural journal aimed at an intellectual readership – and in a radio essay titled "The Jews are Guilty." At the Wannsee conference in January 1942, the Nazi leadership decided to murder the Jews of Europe on a systematic basis.

Though Hitler was the main force behind the regime's anti-Jewish campaign, Goebbels was its leading practitioner. In 1943, when the gas chambers and ovens of Auschwitz were operating at full tilt, he said in a radio essay: "Jewry now understands that the war has become a war against them."

Until his death by suicide two years later, Goebbels and his clique fervently believed their own hateful propaganda.

Diabetes breakthrough gives Toronto family hope

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Last December, diabetes sufferers around the world were given reason to hope when scientists at the Hospital for Sick Children announced they had made a major breakthrough in understanding the disease.

Researchers at the hospital were quoted as saying they were "stunned" at their own findings, which showed that the body's nervous system may be the primary trigger for diabetes, not the immune system, as previously thought.

Tests on non-obese diabetic (NOD) mice revealed that an injection of capsaicin, the active ingredient in chili peppers that makes them spicy, killed defective pancreatic sensory nerves and almost instantly resulted in a return to normal pancreatic production of insulin, a substance lacking in many diabetics that's crucial to the body's ability to process sugar.

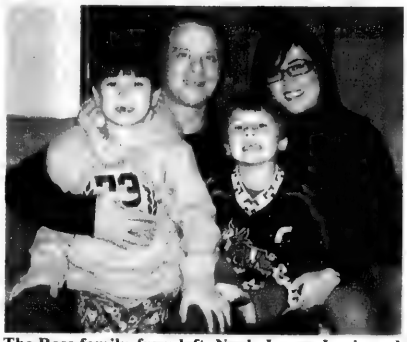
Some mice remained "cured" for several months afterward.

The study led to speculation a cure for humans might be around the corner and inspired the Sick Kids researchers to keep testing their theories.

The Ross family in Toronto knows how much a cure would mean.

Suzanne and Larry Ross are proud parents of Jamie, 7, and Noah, 9. Both boys are rambunctious, intelligent, love hockey, attend United Synagogue Day School and share a fierce brotherly loyalty to one another.

They also both have Type I diabetes, which means their bodies produce little or no insulin. (In Type II, the body can't use the insulin it produces effectively.)



The Ross family, from left: Noah, Larry, Jamie and Suzanne [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

It's a reality the brothers have resigned themselves to, particularly Noah, who was diagnosed at age four and has spoken tirelessly on behalf of the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation.

A diabetic can't naturally store and use glucose, which is found in foods such as breads and grains, to fuel their body, as insulin is the means by which it does so. If left untreated, diabetes can lead to blindness, kidney failure, heart disease and amputation of limbs.

Both Noah and Jamie, who himself was diagnosed just one month ago, use a device called an insulin pump to keep them healthy.

About the size of a pager, the battery-powered pump is programmed to regulate insulin levels in the body via a subcutaneous implanted catheter. The boys require a new catheter injection every three days.

While it's a technology that's light years ahead of what diabetics used to rely on – numerous self-injections several times a day – according to the family, it's still no walk in the park.

"It's bad [living with diabetes]. It would mean everything to me to have a cure. Taking a needle every three days…" Noah said, shaking his head as his voice trailed off shyly.

"I was really sad when I was diagnosed," Jamie said. "[But] whenever I feel low, [Noah] gets a juice for me and he told me it's OK having diabetes."

Larry and Suzanne visibly react with a mixture of pride and sadness at this exchange between their boys.

Despite the leap in technology represented by the pump, it's not foolproof.

"I get up every night to check [Noah's] blood sugar," said Suzanne. "You can't take any time off from it."

The boys also still need to poke their fingers up to 12 times a day to check their levels, she said.

"But everyone has to deal with hurdles," Larry added. "You can be a victim or you can be thankful. And our kids have it in them to deal with this."

When news of the recent study broke, the Rosses were guardedly jubilant, comparing the moment to other significant scientific advances, such as the discovery of penicillin.

"It was unfathomable. And God-willing, this will [lead to a cure]," Suzanne said.

The results flew in the face of conventional wisdom about Type I and Type II diabetes, which held that the disease is strictly an autoimmune disorder.

"Our idea… is that an alteration in the feedback interaction circuit between the [pancreas'] insulin-producing cells and the sensory nerve fibres that contact them is critical for initiating steps that lead to diabetes in the NOD mice," Dr. Michael Salter, a pain expert at Sick Kids and a member of the research team, told The CJN.

The Rosses' hope remains rooted in Salter's and others' budding research.

But for all their optimism, they're scared for their children's future, because they realize it could only take one bad day, one missed blood level, for catastrophe to strike.

"We're terrified," Suzanne said. "Which is why we're teaching them good [diabetes routine] habits and… hoping they will continue this lifestyle forever."

Noah summed this up in a 2006 school essay titled Noah's Life With Diabetes. "Diabetes makes my life a lot harder," he wrote. "I hope those scientists out there in there [sic] laboratories one day find a cure."

Youth safe house to hold Feb. 10 fundraiser

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jewish youth at risk and their families will benefit from the first major fundraising event of Chezi's Corner, a safe house that offers youths ages 16 to 24 short stays while they prepare to move forward with their lives.

Chezi Goldberg

The facility, which is affiliated with Regesh Family and Child Services, is hosting Diamonds, Denim & Dim Sum at Gladstone's Wine Bar and Grill, 398 Eglinton Ave. W., on Sunday, Feb. 10 at 8 p.m.

The event, chaired by Aleta Shiff, will feature an upscale silent auction with diamonds and other fine jewelry, as well as estate silverware and many other items. There will also be a presentation of vintage denim clothing by Jeanilicious, modeled by members of the Chezi's Corner committee.

Along with dim sum selections, donors will enjoy an array of specialty foods including dumplings, spring rolls and sushi combinations.

Chezi's Corner was named in memory of Toronto-born Yechezkel "Chezi" Goldberg, an internationally renowned psychologist who specialized in counselling troubled teenagers. He was also a freelance columnist whose Lifeline column appeared regularly in the Jewish Press.

Goldberg, who made aliyah with his family, was murdered by a suicide bus bomber in Jerusalem in January 2004 at the age of 42. He is survived by his wife Shifra and seven children.

Skate-a-thon planned for juvenile diabetes

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The first official fundraiser in memory of Tracey Rubinoff was so successful last year that organizers are holding the same family event again this week.

The Tracey Rubinoff Diabetes Hope Skate-a-thon, which raises funds for juvenile diabetes, takes place Feb. 4 from 1 to 4 p.m.at the Ricoh Centre at Exhibition Place.

Last year's event drew 400 people of all ages and raised $100,000 for the Tracey Rubinoff Diabetes Hope Fund, which is part of the Diabetes Hope Foundation, a charity that helps children with juvenile diabetes.

This year, organizers hope to raise $125,000 for the fund, said Fred Rubinoff, Tracey's husband. The vivacious mother of two died in 2004 from complications related to diabetes. She was 43. She had been a diabetic since age 10.

Rubinoff stressed that his wife, who had worked as a teacher and later as a social worker, never tried to garner sympathy because she was ill.

"Tracey never, ever, wanted anyone to think of her and treat her differently. It [diabetes] was something she had to deal with."

He said she was very sick for the last eight years of her life. "There were many tough moments. Every single breath she took was a miracle. Tracey was the bravest person you'll ever want to meet."

Rubinoff said the fundraiser is a way to keep his wife's name alive through the connection with a worthwhile charity. The scope of Diabetes Hope Foundation includes the provision of academic scholarships, money for medical paraphernalia, and funds for Camp Huronda, a camp for children with diabetes.

About a year after Tracey died, her husband and a small group of close friends met to plan a fundraiser in her memory. They brainstormed to come up with an event that would reflect her passion, Rubinoff recalled.

The skate-a-thon was a natural choice, because it's a family event and the Rubinoffs had maintained a long involvement with hockey through their two sons, Spencer, how 14, and Jesse, now 18.

Rubinoff has been a supporter of the Diabetes Hope Foundation for eight years.

A week after his wife's death, $25,000 was raised in her memory for the foundation, he said. "We started a scholarship in Tracey's name. I wanted the money to go to a great cause and this is a great cause."

He said admission to the skate-a-thon costs $100 for a family of up to five people, or $25 per person. The fee includes lunch, a tattoo booth and shoot-to-score for children, among other types of entertainment.

This year, three hockey Olympians will be making guest appearances. Paul Rosen, goaltender for the gold-medal-winning Paralympic sledge hockey team, and Jayna Hefford and Kathleen Kauth of the Canadian and American women's hockey teams, respectively, will all be on hand.

There will also be a lot of signed sports items, including hockey shirts signed by NHL stars Sidney Crosby and Wayne Gretzky in support of the skate-a-thon.

For more information, contact Rubinoff at 416-419-4800 or visit www.diabeteshope foundation.com/traceyrubinoffskate.

New group at York gives voice to pro-Israel students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There is no doubt that tensions between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students at York University have increased since the end of the Israeli war with Hezbollah in Lebanon last summer.

But Jonathan Roth, 18, a first-year economics student at York, has founded a group called the Campus Coalition of Zionists (CCZ) to ensure that pro-Israel students have a voice.

"It is a recognized group on campus, which is politically based, and the aim is to raise awareness on issues pertaining to, but not necessarily limited to, Israel," said Roth, CCZ's president.

Nati Philosophe, a first-year economics student at York and the vice-president of the group, said the coalition was formed in response to groups such as Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

He said pro-Palestinian groups often bring their side of the story to students on campus through rallies, and CCZ plans to organize events to bring the other side of the story.

"When you see all the propaganda on campus, I feel like people don't know how to respond or they are not the type to go out there and respond. But if they see other people doing it as role models, maybe they will follow suit. Nobody wants to stand up alone," Philosophe said.

"When we first came to York, almost on a weekly basis, we would come down to Vari Hall, which is the main area, and there would be some kind of event run by Palestinian groups, like Israel Apartheid Week and things like that. We were anticipating a response from Hillel or from a different group to show that Israel is not an apartheid state, but there was nothing like that," Roth said.

Nati Philosophe, left, and Jonathan Roth discuss the need for the Campus Coalition of Zionists at York University.

He said Hillel did have an Israel appreciation day, but he felt that this wasn't a proper response to the anti-Israel sentiments being expressed at York on a regular basis.

"We feel that someone should present the truth from a political standpoint about Israel and how it isn't an apartheid state," Roth said.

The group, which was formed at the start of the 2006-07 school year, already has a membership of 30 students who signed up during their first event in October, Roth said.

"Our first program… was called 'We've JiHAD Enough,' which was basically about the problem of terror, specifically in Israel, but also as a global problem, with information about how Israel deals with the problem," Roth said.

"We had two main displays. The first was about Israel and the security fence. It explained why it's OK for Israel to have a security fence. Then we had a display board that had examples of terror in countries all over the world, such as the terror attack in Madrid, the London transit bombing… At some point, you have to point out what the other side is doing so you can explain how Israel is dealing with it."

In an attempt to illustrate their ideas about the issue of terrorism, Roth decided to display a number of editorial cartoons, two of which depict Hamas and Hezbollah militants using innocent civilians as human shields.

But in an editorial featured in the Excalibur, York's campus paper, the writer claimed that the cartoons "provided racist justifications for the killing of Palestinian and Lebanese children."

"We did use a number of political cartoons, which were intentionally misinterpreted by the newspaper," Roth said.

He said the use of the political cartoons was not the main focus, but was meant to attract students to their display.

"We could have just handed out fact sheets with information about what Israel is, but that's been done and it doesn't work as well. People came over [to see the cartoons], and once they were over, they looked at the information and they saw the other literature that we were distributing," Roth said.

He added that although some were angry – one girl even resorted to ripping down a poster – he was encouraged by others who approached the table to say they had been waiting for someone to do something like this at York.

"We wanted to get our name out and say that we are not going to shy away from things that may be controversial."

But the newest campaign CCZ is working on, called Pendants for Peace, is taking a step back from controversy.

As of last week, CCZ began selling pendants on campus with the names of the three kidnapped Israeli soldiers, Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, who have been missing since last summer.

All proceeds will go to the One Family Fund, an organization that helps victims of terror and their families.

"We feel that a lot of students want to help out, so here is a way that they can support the victims of terror and let them know that they are not alone," Philosophe said.

Roth said students at other campuses such as the University of Western Ontario and Ryerson University have agreed to sell the pendants, and he is in the process of making arrangements with students at McGill University who offered to help as well.

The suggested donation for a pendant is $10.

CHAT alums perform in Montreal

By EVAN MALACH
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Three CHAT grads from the Montreal band Moksa recently combined rock music and philanthropy in an effort to raise awareness about the group End Poverty Now.

Moksa band members Jordan Safer, Adam Jesin and Zeke Kaplan – all graduates of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and all students at McGill University– performed last month in the End Poverty Now Benefit Concert at Café Campus in Montreal.

Safer, the band's keyboardist who also dabbles in harmonica and slide guitar, is a volunteer for End Poverty Now, a campus organization that was born out of Make Poverty History McGill, which aims to end abject poverty.

"The main idea of End Poverty Now is to get people talking, because nothing is going to happen if no one is talking," said Safer, a political science student.

"The goal of the concert was to raise awareness and spread the word. Around 200 people were in attendance… We really got the word out and it was a really big success," he added.

Moksa, which also features David Dworkin and Jeff Howe, opened for The Sins, a band fresh off their tour with rock legend Alice Cooper, and Grady, a grungy blues rock band featuring guitar virtuoso Gordie Johnson, formerly of the band Big Sugar.

Jesin, Moksa's lead singer and guitarist, believes that the band members' Jewish high school education directly influenced their desire to give back to the community.

"CHAT instilled in me a deep sense of social awareness," said Jesin, a history major. "I've always been a person who believed in helping the needy, and my education at CHAT and my teachers there emphasized the importance of those values."

Moksa's dedication to religious obligation goes beyond just performing in the occasional charity gig.

The band refuses to perform on Shabbat and will decline any invitation to play on Friday night, no matter how tempting it may be. In fact, sound-alike word "muktza" refers to any item that is prohibited on Shabbat.

Kaplan, the band's lead guitarist, said he named the group Moksa because it also refers to the Sanskrit concept of "moksha," which means liberation in eastern religions such as Buddhism and Hinduism.

"I gave a lot of thought to that duality, to the two sides of the coin concept: striving for freedom, but staying true to our ancestry and heritage," said Kaplan, who is majoring in world religions.

On Campus

Jewish student conference held in Kingston

By EVA COHEN
Special to The CJN

Roughly 200 Jewish student leaders from campuses across eastern Canada came together this month at the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' OWN conference to learn about being ambassadors for change.

The third annual conference, held at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., from Jan. 18 to 21, included seminars with renowned professors and activists, as well as three keynote addresses by Rabbi Niles Goldstein of the New Shul in New York; Judy Feld Carr, who is famous for helping to smuggle thousands of Jews out of Syria; and Craig Kielburger, founder of Free the Children.

Craig Kielburger
[Eva Cohen photo]

The opening keynote address by Rabbi Goldstein about his New Shul in New York and his book, Gonzo Judaism: A Bold Path for Renewing an Ancient Faith, sparked a lively debate among the audience during the question and answer period.

Feld Carr spoke after Friday night Shabbat services about how she rescued thousands of Jews from Syria by bribing officials and anyone else who could aid in the removal of Jews for whom it was illegal to emigrate.

The final keynote speaker, Kielburger, spoke about Free the Children, the largest network in the world of children helping children through education. Kielburger founded it 11 years ago when he was 12.

Judy Feld Carr

At breakfast one morning, he came across an article in the Toronto Star about a former child labourer who was murdered during his crusade for the rights of children. He was so moved by the story that he brought the article into his Grade 7 class and asked who would help him.

"Eleven hands shot up and that is how we began Free the Children. We were known as the Twelve 12-year-olds," he said.

Although Kielburger is not Jewish, he grew up in Thornhill, a suburb of Toronto with a large Jewish population. He displayed his familiarity with Jewish philosophy during his talk.

"You save one life, it is like you have saved the entire world," Kielburger said, quoting from the Talmud.

He visited Africa for the first time at age 12, only a few months after he began Free the Children. Kielburger, now 23, recently completed his degree in peace and conflict studies at the University of Toronto and has just returned from a trip to Ethiopia and other parts of East Africa.

Kielburger said he saw much desperation and many people in dire circumstances, but he also saw much more.

"Hope is an overused word," he said. "But the only way I can describe what I find in those countries are stories of hope."

He said he experienced the warm hospitality of people who have nothing. He saw that for many children, their biggest dream is to go to school, and he saw the light it their eyes when a school was built for them.

Through Kielburger's work, more than 400 schools in 21 countries have been built, helping more than 35,000 children.

Danielle Kubes, a second-year philosophy student from Carleton University, attended Kielburger's lecture and was moved by his message.

"His speech made you feel like anybody with enough drive actually could make a difference," Kubes said.

"It is possible to do something for change."

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Why worry?

By RABBI MATTHEW KAUFMAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

I recently saw in Time magazine a caption that read, "If you worry, you die. If you don't worry, you die. So, why worry?" While the intent seems to have been to remind us not to be too stressful in our lives, the statement at the same time unintentionally conveys a rather depressing message about the meaning of life. If, in the end, our fate is to cease to exist, then what is the point of life?

The message "why worry?" is, in the final analysis, a justification for being apathetic, for not caring about the world and those around us. From a Jewish perspective, this attitude towards life is anathema.

The underlying message behind the holiday of Tu b'Shvat, which we celebrate on Feb. 3 this year, conveys precisely the opposite teaching: we must care for the world in which we live.

Popularly known as a kind of Jewish Arbour Day, the rabbis teach that Tu b'Shvat was established as one of four "new years" we observe during the course of the year. This New Year for trees served to mark a date for calculating the ma'aser (the tithing of the produce of trees) and the orlah (the principle that the first fruits of a tree were permitted for use only after four years had passed).

In essence, Tu b'Shvat was used as a halachic device to determine the age of trees. This date had great significance in the agricultural life of Israel, for it marked the mid-point of the heavy rains of the Israeli winter. After this time, the rains begin to taper off, and the sap rises in the trees.

But the agricultural aspect of Tu b'Shvat has always been complemented by a rabbinic understanding of a deeper lesson about the meaning of life, of our responsibility to care for the earth and for the future generations.

Over the centuries, as Tu b'Shvat came to be seen as a time to celebrate the renewal of life, mystical rituals developed to mark the ascent of the soul to its source in God, mirroring the reawakening of trees as the sap begins to rise with the advent of the changing season. Tu b'Shvat became, for the mystics, an opportunity for us to go beyond our normal human limitations and experience a reality grander than that which can normally be perceived, given our frail mortality.

In a well-known talmudic story, Honi "the Circle Maker" sees a man planting the seed of a tree that would not reach its full growth for another 70 years. It seems an exercise in futility to Honi, since the one who planted it would long be dead before that. The man explains that he is doing it for the future generations. The paralyzing sense of the futility of life is refuted by placing one's hope in future generations.

The Talmud relates that when the rabbis took leave of Rabbi Ammi's school (some say, Rabbi Chanina's), they would say to him: "May you see your vision for the world fulfilled in your lifetime, and... may your hope rest with future generations." It is an odd blessing, asserting the hope of seeing the messianic age, and at the same time, reaffirming that the proper locus for our hopes and dreams is in our children and our children's children.

So, why worry? Because life has meaning. Because apathy is not an option. Our personal sense of fulfilment must not rely solely upon the satisfaction that we experience, but upon the role that we play in continually fashioning a better world for ourselves and our descendants.

Am I my planet's keeper?

By EVONNE MARZOUK

Guest Voice

In the story of Cain and Abel, when Cain murders Abel and God questions him, Cain responds, "Am I my brother's keeper?" This often-quoted rhetorical question has come to represent an ethical responsibility that all human beings have toward each other.

Today, in a time when the car I choose to drive can have dramatic consequences for people on a small island thousands of miles away, our responsibility to our brother must include our impact on the world.

When God first created the world, the Torah says, "God saw everything He had made, and behold, it was very good." Today, in that same world, more than half of our major rivers are seriously depleted and polluted, and nearly 1.8 million people die each year because of urban pollution. In our oceans, 90 per cent of all large fish have been removed, and estimates predict that they will be gone by 2048.

The Millennium Ecosystem Assessment, an international project to assess our global ecosystems, concluded that in the past 50 years, humans have changed ecosystems more rapidly and extensively than in any comparable period in human history. This activity has resulted in a substantial and largely irreversible loss in the diversity of life on Earth, and, unless altered, will substantially decrease the resources available for future generations.

Some people have blamed this situation on a biblical instruction in Genesis: And God blessed them and said, "Be fruitful and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, the birds of the air, and every living thing that moves on the Earth."

But we must also look at another instruction: And the Lord God took the man and put him into the Garden of Eden, to work it and to guard it.

Rav Joseph Soloveitchik, in his book, Lonely Man of Faith, discusses two different conceptions of man based on these verses. He describes "Adam One" as a physical person who works the earth and uses it for his physical needs. "Adam Two," the spiritual side, is the person who experiences awe at the majesty of creation. Rav Soloveitchik says both these elements are needed for a complete person. From an environmental perspective, we can see a message that is manifest throughout the Torah. Our responsibility is to use the resources that God has given to us, but also to use them wisely.

This balance is seen in the laws of Judaism. For example, in the Talmud (Bava Batra), we read that certain industries were restricted in their proximity to residential areas, to protect the neighbouring residents from this early form of pollution.

But we also have a responsibility to protect other species. The mitzvah in Deuteronomy of "sending away the mother bird before taking her young" is explained by Nachmanides as related to the prohibition against "slaughtering an animal and its kid in one day." He writes: "We should not have a cruel and merciless heart, [and] the Torah should not permit us to destroy... a species."

Beyond our responsibility to living things, the mitzvah of "do not destroy" outlines the prohibition from needlessly destroying.

We have a midrash that summarizes our responsibility to the world. We learn that when God created Adam, He led him around the Garden of Eden and said, "Look at My works... Everything that I have created, I created for you. Take care not to damage and destroy My world, for if you damage it, there is no one to repair it after you."

Today, our Jewish responsibility calls us to be a keeper not only of our brother, but of all of our fellow inhabitants on Earth and the precious natural resources that sustain us. This Tu b'Shvat, let us commit to become informed of the environmental challenges we are facing, and to take action to educate ourselves and make a difference.

Rewriting the Bible, Part II

Past Forward

Last month, we discussed the Anchor Bible Project and its editor, David Noel Freedman, the protégé of the biblical scholar, W.F. Albright. The project originally began 50 years ago when the Anchor division of Doubleday asked Freedman and Albright to do a one-volume translation of the King James Bible with the possibility of expanding the project to three volumes.

The project now encompasses over 70 volumes with millions of copies sold. The first volume on Genesis remains a bestseller, but it is being rewritten to take into account current scholarship. The original volume was written more than 40 years ago by the eminent Jewish scholar E.A. Speiser, who died in 1965.

Speiser based much of his work on the discovery of cuneiform tablets at sites such as Nuzi, in north-west Mesopotamia, which are dated to the middle of the second millennium BCE. Using this material he tried to draw biblical parallels with such things as the wife-sister motif that Abraham used when trying to pawn Sarah off to Pharaoh as his wife. Despite Speiser's meticulous scholarship, his hypothesis has not stood the test of time.

Shortly after the appearance of Speiser's volume, work was begun on another landmark translation, that of the Book of Psalms, by the Lebanese-American Jesuit scholar, Mitchell Dahood of the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome. Dahood had also been a pupil of Albright's and a friend of Freedman's. He specialized in the biblical application of the sensational textual discoveries at the site of ancient Ugarit, modern Ras Sharma, on the Syrian coast opposite Cyprus.

As with a number of other major archeological finds, including the Dead Sea Scrolls, Ugarit was discovered by accident, in 1928. The excavators uncovered a huge archive in an unknown script, which turned out to be ancestral to the alphabet, but used the cuneiform method of notation invented by the Sumerians in Mesopotamia over 5,000 years ago.

Once deciphered, the Ugaritic language was found to have close affinities to biblical Hebrew. The three volumes on Psalms were a source of much controversy, but they gave scholars new perspectives on the biblical materials.

The Ugaritic materials have been used by other contributors to the series, notably Marvin Pope of Yale in his translation of the Song of Songs and Job. Freedman himself used the Ugaritic materials for the translation of Hosea, which he did with Francis Andersen of McQuarie University in Australia.

Freedman also worked on the Dead Sea Scrolls, preparing the Paleo-Hebrew Leviticus Scroll for publication with one of his graduate students.

His major contribution, however, is in his behind the scenes work that led to the scrolls' release to the world at large. In the '80s, philanthropist Elizabeth Hay Bechtel approached Freedman about photographing the scrolls. With his help, Bechtel brought the negatives to the Ancient Manuscript Center at Claremont University and placed them in the vaults of the Huntington Library there. Later, the release of these photos broke the stranglehold on publication by the original members of the scrolls committee.

Now in his 84th year, Freedman continues his work. Publishing the legendary Leningrad Codex in 1998 would have been enough to ensure his immortality in biblical studies, but in 2000, he and his assistant Dr. Astrid Beck, of the University of Michigan, began editing another series of biblical works for Eerdman's publishing house in Grand Rapids, Michigan.

In the 30 years I have known Freedman, I find he personifies the best in a long tradition of American scholarship, a tradition that embodies respect for the views of others and a desire to get at the truth, based on meticulous research and scholarship. It is a tradition that has a long past for which people have paid dearly. As we move forward into the new century I hope that it has an equally long future.

Web 2.0 and Jewish values

It's 2007. Do you know what your kids are blogging? Or uploading? Or sharing about themselves online for their friends – and the entire world to see?

The Internet has undergone a revolution in the last couple of years. It gained fame over a decade ago as a place where you could read about practically any topic under the sun. But along came far more interactive sites like blogs and wikis, and places like YouTube [http://youtube.com], Myspace [http://myspace.com] and Flickr [http://flickr.com], which thrive on the contributions of their visitors.

These social networking sites, known collectively as "Web 2.0" [http://tinyurl.com/nc8g3], have made the Internet a much more interactive and interesting place to visit. Facebook [http://facebook.com], for example, allows millions of high school and university students to create profiles, join groups of friends, post messages and share photos. At the same time, these sites have also created new opportunities to allow members to descend into lashon hara (wronging people through speech) and online bullying.

Last year, leaders at the North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY), saw the writing on the web and decided to do something about it. They did a search for what members of the Reform Judaism youth group had written about themselves and their friends on various social networking websites. They didn't like what they found. So, on the eve of a youth leadership conference, they started printing out page after page of this material, 5,000 pages in all.

Here's how the Associated Press described the scene. "Walls of an auditorium were covered with thousands of sheets of paper – printouts from MySpace, Facebook, YouTube and other online sites that were filled with back-stabbing gossip, unflattering images, and details about partying and dating exploits." [http://tinyurl.com/34y62w]

"'There was some pretty terrible stuff written,' Dean Carson, the youth group's president told Forward.com. A handful of postings included nude photographs, but most, said Carson, just had 'a lot of lashon hara,' Hebrew for an 'evil tongue,' the term traditionally used to describe the sin of gossiping.

"Carson complained that not only are teenagers damaging their own reputations with salacious web postings – as employers increasingly turn to the sites for information on potential recruits – but they could also wreak havoc on NFTY's reputation." [http://tinyurl.com/wogk8]

Instead of trying to impose regulations on members, Carson and 140 student board members discussed and debated recommendations for the proper use of these networking sites. Andy Shoenig, immediate past president of NFTY, headed the initiative. "Our tradition teaches: 'If a person guards his speech, others will emulate him and he will be rewarded for that merit also,'" said Shoenig, currently studying at Emory University in Atlanta. "This holds true for our blogs, online videos, MySpace profiles and Facebook accounts," he said. "We, as the leaders of the MySpace generation, must maintain our Jewish values in all our communications." [http://tinyurl.com/2j79zp]

In their resolution, the group members "recognize the general importance of the Jewish value of pratiyut, privacy, and reinforce the prevalence of this issue through perpetuating a healthy, safe and self-respectful online environment." They call on NFTY to "take a stand that encourages ethical blogging in online forums." You can read their full recommendations in the document, Sanctity in Online Spaces. [http://tinyurl.com/2tv2gx]

Although the initiative was overwhelmingly passed, the vote was not unanimous. Madeleine Levey, president of NFTY Michigan, told Forward that she was uncomfortable with her group's suggestions. "I have a Facebook and a MySpace page, and I believe it's completely my choice how I want to maintain those things," she said.

NFTY's work is not done. The group will meet later this month at its annual convention in Philadelphia to continue the dialogue with "OurSpace: Ethics in Online Forums… an in-depth look at both the positive and negative effects of online communities and how to integrate Jewish values into online communities." [http://tinyurl.com/3aba4a]

New tool added in ongoing pursuit of fair funding

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Ontario Jewish leaders are reaching out to the public for help in the ongoing challenge of securing public funding for Jewish day schools. The Ontario Day School Fair Funding Initiative developed by Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region (CJC), UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its Board of Jewish Education, recently launched www.fundingfairness.ca, a new website designed to include the public in its advocacy efforts to secure fair public funding for faith-based schools across the province.

Those efforts have included meetings with representatives of all political parties in Ontario, discussions with members of other faith communities, and various media appearances.

"This new initiative recognizes the need for better communication with our most important stakeholders, schools, students, and their families," said Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director and national general counsel for CJC. "On our new website, regular updates will keep parents, students and educators apprised of our efforts and inform them about how they can directly get involved."

So just what can the public do?

"We strongly encourage parents and community members to share their positive experiences in Jewish day schools. They can help us educate the public about what Jewish day school education has meant for them and their children, and how they have applied their education to help all Ontarians by integrating as full contributing members of Ontario society," says Shulman. "If your child participates in community activities, tell us about it. If you read one of our articles, or come across an opposing viewpoint, let the press know that you support our position. If a political decision-maker does something that helps our community, thank them for it."

Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and UJA Federation have launched a new website - www.fundingfairness.ca - designed to include the public in the effort to obtain provincial funding for faith-based schools.

In addition to providing an overview of the Ontario school system, arguments in favour of faith-based education, and articles related to the issue, the website outlines five basic principles that underlie the initiative and shape its advocacy efforts: the centrality of faith-based education to Canada's religiously diverse cultural mosaic; the status of faith-based education as part of the public trust and the importance of bringing it into the publicly funded sphere; the need for equity to ensure that students from all schools are positive and effective contributors to society; the expectation that faith-based schools would meet approved provincial criteria; and a commitment to accountability standards.

"Extending full funding to Catholic schools has strengthened public education," says Jonathan Schwartz, education policy advisor for CJC Ontario Region. "We hope to further strengthen education in this province by bringing our schools and other faith based schools into the public sphere."

MASA promotes closer links with Israel

With close to 300 in attendance at its first Israel Program Fair, MASA – a UJA Federation-supported initiative established to connect young Jewish adults (18 to 30) in the Diaspora with Israel - came closer to achieving its annual goal of attracting 20,000 participants.

The recent fair, held in the Leah Posluns Theatre, featured 20 organizations which attracted parents, grandparents and students looking for information on programs ranging from undergraduate academics and career development to community service and Jewish studies.

MASA, a passion of former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, was founded in 2004 by the Government of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner. It was created to provide financial support for young people to participate in long-term Israeli programs, after studies showed a positive correlation between such programs and enhanced Jewish identity.

Funding is provided by the Government of Israel, JAFI, United Jewish Communities of North America, and individual Federations.

"I see people who've visited Israel dozens of times, but they don't really know Israel," said Israeli Consul General Kobi Brosh. "The main advantage to MASA is that it gives everyone the opportunity to live in Israel for a few months – to have the unique opportunity to live as an Israeli, day-to-day."

"I had to come out to the program fair to see what other opportunities there were to volunteer, work, study, and live in Israel that I hadn't yet heard about," said Natalie Moskowitz, a third-year York University student and CIE Taglit-birthright israel alumna, who stayed on to volunteer in Eilat. "I was there this past summer for three months and I know that I want to go back, so any opportunity I may have I want to find out more about and make it happen."

Randi Gordner, a MASA program alumna, agreed. Gordner was at the fair representing Tikun Olam Tel Aviv, a ten-month volunteer program in which she participated last year. Six weeks on a kibbutz that included hiking and Hebrew classes were followed by eight months living in a poor area of Tel Aviv where she volunteered teaching English to Iraqi, Iranian, and Yemenite Jews.

"Living in the neighbourhood, you're forced to speak Hebrew," said Gordner. "I wasn't just a tourist, I lived there. So there's a sense of responsibility. It definitely deepened my relationship with the State of Israel."

The 10 months she spent in Israel also had a profound effect on Gordner's Jewish identity.

"It's much more important to me now to marry someone Jewish and raise a Jewish family," said Gordner. "There's definitely a sense of pride in being Jewish that wasn't there before."

"It's wonderful to know young Jewish people are looking at Israel as a place for them to gain experience, build their resume, travel and grow," said Alex Kojfman, Toronto's MASA coordinator. "MASA is here to offer a multitude of opportunities that weren't available. Israel has a lot to offer Canadians, and I believe Jewish Canadians have a lot to offer Israel."

Alex Kojfman, Toronto's MASA coordinator, shares some insights with students interested in learning in Israel in the coming year.

Keeping your kids in financial shape

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

If you're typical of many parents with young kids, much of your evenings and weekends are spent chauffeuring your brood to various extracurricular sports programs and activities.

Well, thanks to last year's federal budget, you might actually get paid for your efforts this year in the form of the new children's fitness tax credit that came into play on January 1st.

This non-refundable tax credit is available in 2007 for up to $500 in "eligible fees" for the enrolment of a child under 16 in an "eligible program of physical activity." This federal credit will be worth 15.5% of the amount spent, up to the $500 maximum per child.

An eligible program of physical activity, for the purposes of the new credit, will be defined as "an ongoing, supervised program, suitable for children, in which substantially all of the activities undertaken include a significant amount of physical activity that contribute to cardio-respiratory endurance, plus one or more of: muscular strength, muscular endurance, flexibility, and balance."

Jamie Golombek

The above definition should cover not only most sports but should also be broad enough to encompass other children's recreational programs that involve a substantial physical exertion component, such as dance lessons.

Taking into account Canada's Physical Activity Guides for Children and Youth published by the Public Health Agency of Canada, in order for a program to be eligible for the tax credit, it should consist of at least 30 minutes of "sustained moderate to vigorous physical activity" per session for children under the age of 10. Kids 10 and over should be active for at least an hour.

Furthermore, the government stated that the programs will only be eligible for the tax credit if they are at least eight weeks long with a minimum of one session per week. Children's camps may also qualify if they are at least five consecutive days, provided half the program time is devoted to physical activity.

What about children's memberships in recreational community centres, such as the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto or the uptown Bathurst JCC? Good news – the child's membership dues paid to join such a club should also qualify, provided they join for at least two months and no less than half the child's time is spent on qualifying physical activities.

The cost of extracurricular physical activities at school will also be eligible for the credit.

What better time than now to consider signing up your kids for that new JCC membership or enrolling them in one of the myriad physical fitness programs our community centres offer.

JEWISH TORONTO IS PUBLISHED AS A COMMUNITY SERVICE BY UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO.

Introducing the Chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2008

Perlis, Binstock Offman and Yakubowicz head to Israel aboard fact-finding mission

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Months before the community launch of UJA Federation Campaign 2008 in August, Morris Perlis and Lesley Binstock Offman, the incoming chairs of the campaign are readying themselves for a fact-finding mission to Israel, along with the new chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A), Liora Yakubowicz.

"We're off to Israel in about a week where we'll be meeting with people and, from those meetings, will come thoughts on and about Campaign 2008," says Perlis, a respected business leader, long-time community volunteer and philanthropist who, among other things, sits on the board and executive of UJA Federation and the Canadian Council for Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). "After that, we'll have to find a strong and marketable way to communicate Israel's needs and make people feel as passionate as we are, and then we'll be off and running."

According to Perlis, among the key challenges of chairing the campaign is having the best people in the right position.

"Our job is to get the best and brightest and most dedicated people that we can because, at the end of the day, Lesley and I will be able to take care of only part of it," he says.

Perlis, the son of Holocaust survivors who was born in a Displaced Persons camp right after the war, takes the responsibility of chairing the campaign very seriously.

"I care passionately and am very proud of being Jewish, proud of the community we're in and I take very little for granted," he says. "Our community didn't just get there without the enormous hard work of lots of people over time. Leadership has to stand up and help raise the funds that are necessary. I therefore stepped back and said, 'it's an honour to be identified as someone who could help keep the momentum going'. I just feel totally passionate about what it takes to have a great community. It occurs when you have a vision and a strategy of where you're trying to get to."

Morris Perlis

Lesley Binstock Offman

Liora Yakubowicz

As for Morris's fellow chair, Binstock Offman, a veteran philanthropist and volunteer since first helping her mother at the Hadassah Bazaar in the 1950s, she was proud to accept the role even though she, like Perlis, already has a full schedule.

"I did, and do, have a full slate, but UJA Federation has always played a totally compelling role in the Jewish world and I simply couldn't and wouldn't say no," she says. "UJA Federation is the central source for human needs here and in Israel, so it's a humbling and important honour to play such a vital role in Campaign 2008."

To make Campaign 2008 as successful as possible Binstock Offman feels reaching out is key.

"One of the main challenges will be reaching the great silent majority who are able to participate in the campaign, but, for whatever reason, do not get involved," she explains. "We must reach those people and impress upon them how much their gifts would mean to those in need."

For Yakubowicz, who takes the reins of WC&A from outgoing chair Judith Finer Freedman, being offered the role of chair was especially meaningful.

"When Fran Sonshine (a past chair of WC&A) called and asked me to be the next chair, I was extremely honoured and emotional," says Yakubowicz, last year's vice chair of WC&A. "The magnitude of the responsibility, however, was daunting and I have spent the last year planning for my term. I was born in Israel, I came to Canada when I was 12 years old, and I feel that it is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to make an impact for my beloved Israel."

"For decades, the Toronto community has continued to maintain its standard of giving. Our team will make every effort to meet the very high expectations the Jewish world has of Toronto," adds Binstock Offman.

Musical mission builds bridges between Israel and Toronto

Toronto's award-winning Renanim Youth Singers perform at The Clor Centre in Kfar Blum in northern Israel, one of many stops made by the youngsters aboard their recent two-week musical mission.

Thanks to the generosity and vision of a donor to The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto - the endowment arm of UJA Federation - 30 young men and women from Toronto recently shared the gift of song with their Israeli counterparts.

The Renanim Youth Singers, an award-winning group of singers from around the Greater Toronto Area, made their way, along with many of their parents, to Israel aboard the "Bridge of Song With Israel" youth mission. Although the purpose of the two-week mission was to perform community service in Israel, it was clearly both communities that benefited from the experience.

Led by musical director Susan Michaels, the Renanim Youth Singers performed for a number of groups throughout Israel, including Jerusalem's Shalva, a facility which assists mentally and physically challenged Israeli children and their families, and the elderly at Yad LaKashish, as well as 200 wounded soldiers and their families from the Beit Halochem organization in Tel Aviv.

The group of talented youngsters also made their way to Yosephtal Hospital in Eilat, UJA Federation's partnership region. The choir visited cities in northern Israel where they performed for residents affected by this summer's devastating war with Lebanon.

Perhaps the highlight of the mission was an impromptu song session with a group of Israeli youth atop Masada at sunrise.

"There were so many highlights to this musical, spiritual adventure," enthuses Michaels. "After scaling Masada, hearing and seeing the history retold, we met up with birthright israel participants. Hearing that we were a choir, they insisted that we sing. We performed a beautiful a capella version of an Israel song for peace, 'Amen.' The acoustics atop Masada were miraculously beautiful and our sound rang out and resonated from the top of the mountain, out through the hills and beyond.

For Toronto's Jordan Freedman, who celebrated his fourteenth birthday on the trip, it was an experience he'll not soon forget.

"I'd always wanted to go to Israel, and finally, thanks to this trip, I was able to go," says Freedman, who auditioned for Michaels when he heard about the Israel opportunity.

"It was incredible to see all these Israelis - old and young - who were so energetic and happy to see us there. I felt so good inside when we had the chance to perform, especially for the disabled kids of Shalva. It made me feel like I did something really worthwhile; like a mitzvah. And then, they performed for us. It was an amazing experience and I really want to go back to Israel again soon."

"Seeing our children using their talents in this way gave every parent such nachas, and filled our hearts with so much pride," says Jordan's mother, Janice. "Seeing our children perform in Israel, whether it was for the kids of Shalva, singing atop Masada, or performing Hatikvah at Ben Gurion's graveside, while being surrounded by Israel's incredible history and spirituality, brought a tear to our eyes on more than one occassion."

As a result of this musical mission, bridges were built between the Torontonians and groups of people throughout Israel. Choirs from the Golan are now planning to visit their new friends in Toronto where they will be put up by Renanim families. Representatives of Yad LaKashish also plan to come to Toronto for a fundraiser and have asked Renanim to sing at the event.

"The Renanim youth choir trip to Israel was a really unique opportunity," says Lorne Klemensberg, director, Israel Programs, Canada Israel Experience. "Not only were these talented youngsters able to visit Israel - many for the first time - but they were also able to bring joy and light into the lives of hundreds of people through the beautiful music and concerts that were coordinated for them through CIE."

Kids' book launched

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa lawyer Jacques Shore recently launched his second children's book, Friday Night with the Pope, at an event held at Library and Archives Canada.

The book, illustrated by Amalia Hoffman of Larchmont, N.Y., is based on Shore's own experience.

Shore's mother, Lena Allen-Shore, was a close personal friend of the late pope, John Paul II, formerly known as Karol Wojtyla. Both were born and raised in Poland, and although they had not known each other as children, they began a correspondence soon after John Paul II ascended to the papacy. Allen-Shore shared her writings and philosophy with the pontiff for several years in the early 1990s, and she was invited to meet with him in June 2003.

Shore's visit with his mother at that time inspired him to share the story. The unique experience of being invited to Shabbat dinner in the pope's Vatican residence is described in the book through the voice of a younger Shore, "Jacob."

"Tonight promised to be a special evening – longtime friends celebrating the Shabbat together," he writes.

Young Jacob is invited to recite the Kiddush over a cup of grape juice and to bless the bread before the meal begins.

"As the meal was served, Lena and the Holy Father shared childhood memories… John Paul II turned to Jacob and explained that a world that does not share love and kindness is a world that loses a day to help those less fortunate. 'No matter what religion, ethnicity, skin colour or culture, we are all the children of God. God watches over us, but we too must take care of each other.'"

This is the message Shore wants to share with the children of the world through his book and the reason he chose to tell the story through the eyes of a young boy.

"While I was not the age of 11-year-old Jacob, I wanted to share the story through the eyes of a boy because I felt that I was a child in the presence of the late pontiff. I also believed that children reading what happened during that Friday night Sabbath dinner would better understand the pope's teachings as told to a child. With an understanding of these truths, it is my hope that children will be able to share the pope's lessons so as to spread goodwill and build bridges among all people on earth," Shore said at the launch.

"People are looking at this book as a book that goes beyond Catholics and Jews," he said. It is his hope that the book will be used by teachers to facilitate and illustrate interfaith dialogue.

Shore's first foray into children's literature was Menorah in the Night Sky, which, in 2004, received the Our Choice award presented by the Canadian Children's Book Centre. A partner in the advocacy department and government relations practice group in the Ottawa office of the law firm Gowlings, Shore is originally from Montreal and is a graduate of the Université de Montréal and McGill University. He is a member of the bars of Ontario, Quebec, the Northwest Territories and Nunavut. Most of his writing has been on political and unity issues, but he has enjoyed his "detour" into the realm of children's literature.

Some things have changed, but some haven't

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's visit to Jerusalem and Ramallah by Foreign Minister Peter MacKay resulted in front-page Globe and Mail attention. It seemed that only the lurid trial of alleged British Columbia mass murderer Robert Pickton could bump Israel from page A1.

Perhaps the most sensational Globe page-one piece was "Canada making enemies, Hamas warns," by Mark MacKinnon (Jan. 22). It implied that MacKay, and by extension Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government, had "shunned" the Palestinian people by refusing to meet with Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas.

MacKinnon wrote: "Had Mr. MacKay travelled to Gaza City to meet with him, Mr. Zahar said, he would have found an open door. However, Mr. Zahar said he would have challenged the minister to explain why Canada led the world in suspending aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won legislative elections a year ago. The United States and the European Union, which like Canada consider Hamas to be a terrorist organization, also stopped giving aid, leaving the already cash-poor government bankrupt and unable to pay full salaries to its 170,000 civil servants for most of the past year."

MacKinnon pointed out that on Jan. 19, MacKay met with "moderate Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas." Abbas belongs to the Fatah party, which officially recognizes Israel, while Hamas adamantly refuses to do so. Attempts by Abbas to form a national unity government with Hamas have failed. The two parties have been violently clashing for weeks, leading many analysts to describe the situation as a civil war.

MacKinnon wrote that, during an hour-long interview, he told Zahar that MacKay "would likely have… insist[ed] that Hamas still needs to meet the three conditions of the international community – denouncing violence, recognizing Israel and respecting the agreements signed by the previous Palestinian government," at which point Zahar "turned hostile."

Zahar's rejection of Israel became clear: Zahar "suggested that there should be a single Islamic state stretching across the Middle East, adding that there was plenty of space in Canada to establish a Jewish homeland."

MacKinnon wrote: "The hatred for Israel runs deep in Mr. Zahar." However, it is a hatred officially endorsed by the entire Hamas organization and spelled out in its racist charter that calls for the destruction of Israel and the murder of Jews.

In the interview with MacKinnon, Zahar warned that "Canadians have to change their extremist government, or else they're going to lose their credibility as a neutral state… You cannot create a new enemy without a price."

MacKinnon might have asked Zahar what is "extremist" about a Canadian government that advocates a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians, and accepts UN Resolution 242, which calls for the recognition and security of all countries in the region, including foremost Israel. These foreign policy principles upheld by Harper's Conservative government were also endorsed by previous Liberal-led governments. Indeed, it was under Liberal prime minister Paul Martin that Hamas was designated a terrorist organization.

Canadian policy has not shifted in any substantive way. What has changed is that the Palestinians are currently led by an extremist Islamic government.

In a Jan. 5 Globe and Mail online comment, Ottawa columnist Jeffrey Simpson remarked about Harper's cabinet shuffle, including Mideast envoy Wajid Khan's "crossing over" to the Conservatives from the Liberals. One observation from Simpson however, was particularly jarring, and reminiscent of the Mearsheimer/Walt thesis that the U.S. pro-Israel lobby has hijacked American Mideast policy.

Simpson wrote that Khan "gives a government a visible minority presence that it lacks, so in the short term this is good, and it balances the optics of a government that had pretty much handed its Middle East policy over to the Canada-Israel Committee."

In his January 10 National Post column ("For Liberals, the wrong kind of Muslim,") John Turley-Ewart called Simpson's remark "absurd." And unbecoming of someone of Simpson's sophistication.

UJA FEDERATION

Jewish Heritage Centre founder takes charge

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada is looking to one of the organization's founding fathers, Abe Anhang, to lead it into a new era.

Anhang, a real estate developer, was there at the beginning. In 1967, coinciding with Canada's centennial celebrations, Anhang, Abe Arnold and the late Montague Israel, Nate Arkin and Harry Gale, decided to mount an exhibition about Winnipeg's Jewish history.

"We went around collecting artifacts for the exhibit [which was housed at the old YMHA downtown]," Anhang recalls. "We collected so much material that it filled up the auditorium at the Peretz School Building.

"Those artifacts became the basis of our collection, which has continued to grow over the years. Our collection is the largest of any ethnic group in Winnipeg."

Over the years, the Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC), originally known as the Jewish Historical Society, has mounted several major exhibitions, including exhibits about Selkirk Avenue, which was once the Jewish community's main street; Jewish weddings; Jewish music in Winnipeg; Polish Jewry; Thunder Bay, Ont.'s Jewish community; and, most recently, an overview of the life and career of the late Samuel Freedman, Manitoba's first Jewish chief justice.

Exhibits were mounted at the Y or other venues until 1997, when, as a result of the lobbying of a group of history enthusiasts, the JHC was able to establish a permanent Jewish museum in the Jewish Community Campus (JCC), which opened that year.

Abe Anhang, new president of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada, with new JHC archivist Vanessa Harari, who has a masters of anthropology degree from Argentina.

In the past couple of years, the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada and the JHC have run into rough seas. In 2005, the JHC had its funding from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg slashed considerably,while at the same time its rent at the Asper JCC doubled (all the campus tenants had their rent doubled).

As a result of the monetary squeeze, the JHC has been forced to move out of its nine-year-old museum space and give up some of its office space.

Thus, rather than having a museum space per se, the JHC will have three large windows and one exhibit case in the hallway in front of the former museum area (which is being used as a day care) and five large windows in the adjacent hallway. Each window will have a different theme related to the history of Jewish life in western Canada. As well, each window will be wired so that viewers can listen to oral histories and search computer data bases. The artifacts in the windows will be rotated on a regular basis.

At the same time, the JHC has cut its expenses considerably.

Last year, the organization's expenses stood near $283,000, as compared to $337,000 the year before. And an appearance by famed British Jewish historian Sir Martin Gilbert – the inaugural speaker under the the new annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture series – added considerably to the JHC's badly depleted coffers. As a result, last year's revenues exceeded expenses by a few hundred dollars, as compared to a deficit of about $4,000 the year before.

Anhang and community leader and amateur historian Harold Buchwald were instrumental in bringing Gilbert to Winnipeg.

Anhang is enthusiastic about what the future holds for the Jewish Heritage Centre. He notes that over the next year, the JHC will be digitzing all of its 300,000 photos and artifacts and over 60,000 pages of newspaper so that all of the material will be available to researchers on the Internet.

"In the last 18 months, we have acquired the personal papers and archives of not only of Mr. Justice Sam Freedman but also prominent former community leaders Sol Kanee, the late Maitland Steinkopf and the late G. Sidney Halter [a former commissioner of the Canadian Football League]," Anhang says.

The JHC is planning two major exhibits: one is a history of the Jewish involvement in Winnipeg's garment industry; the other is a history of the Jews of Manitoba, which the centre hopes to mount in 2008, the 50th anniversary of the publication of a history of the Jews of Manitoba by the late Rabbi Arthur Chiel.

AIDS ravaging Africa's women, children: Lewis

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Of the 2.3 million children in the world who are living with AIDS, more than 90 per cent of them are in Africa, according to humanitarian and author Stephen Lewis.

And of those, 720,000 require treatment in order to stay alive, but only five per cent are getting it, he said.

Lewis, the United Nations' former special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, presented these sad statistics in a talk titled "The Silent Struggle: Gender and Race Beyond the Canadian Border," as part of events marking Raoul Wallenberg Day on Jan. 17 at the University of Manitoba.

But there is hope for children living with AIDS, Lewis said.

"We are finally going to have affordable medicine for children with AIDS, but this was not done by the United Nations," he said.

"[Former U.S. president] Bill Clinton, and the Clinton Foundation, did it – going to India and negotiating with the two major generic drug companies. Thanks to Clinton, children up to the age of 13 can now be treated for as little as $52 per child, per year. And for younger children, it drops to $13 per child, per year."

Fifty per cent of children born with AIDS die before age two, and 80 per cent die before age five, Lewis said.

"I am sorry to sound aggravated," he said, "but I don't understand the willingness to find kids or anyone else expendable on this planet, when you have the drugs to prevent the infection. In the western world, we never hear of kids being born HIV-positive, because we put an HIV-positive, pregnant woman on full anti-viral therapy for the bulk of her pregnancy. So, when she gives birth, her baby is HIV-negative. The transmission is reduced by nearly 99 per cent."

Lewis asked, "Is the life of an African child worth so much less than the life of a western child?"

He noted that only nine per cent of HIV-positive, pregnant women in African have access to the drugs that prevent mother-to-child transmission.

"Hundreds of thousands of children are born HIV-positive, destined to an early death for no reason whatsoever," Lewis said. "Something could have been done to prevent this, and for whatever complex set of reasons, we failed to do so. I feel an uncontrollable anger about all of this. Why should millions of people be put to the edge of survival and die unnecessarily? How can human life be regarded so casually?"

Stephen Lewis at press conference. [Rebeca Kuropatwa photo]

What was missing at last summer's International AIDS Conference in Toronto, Lewis said, "was the response to the women of Africa and the developing world."

Men are spreading AIDS in Africa, Lewis said.

"Inequality – predatory, male sexual entitlement – is driving the virus," he said. "So many older men marry younger women. The women think they are entering into a monogamous relationship. The older men bring the virus into the marriage.

Married women are more commonly infected than are single women, often due to marital rape. It is a Darwinian process of natural selection – a ferocious assault of one sex."

In the 15-to-24-year-old age group, 77 per cent of Africans infected with the virus are women and girls. Lewis said.

"Women are an endangered species on parts of the continent," Lewis said.

Married women don't have the option of saying "no" or asking to use a condom, he added.

"What is happening on the continent of Africa has no precedent whatsoever," Lewis said. "Grandmothers, in their 60s, 70s and 80s, who have buried their own adult children and are utterly traumatized, then begin to parent again with their orphan grandchildren who have literally watched their parents die. These traumatized orphans and grandmothers are redefining the nature of the human family."

Most people believe that "it will take a couple of generations to change male sexual behaviour, yet the women are dying now," Lewis said.

Something must be done immediately, he urged.

"I don't understand how to explain the passivity and indifference to a whole continent, with a willingness to write off tens of millions of people, unless there is a kind of unacknowledged, subterranean racism at work," Lewis said.

"If this were happening in the Balkans, it would have been stopped by now. But it is in Africa, so it goes on. And 'never again,' becomes 'again, and again, and again.'"

In March 2003, Lewis started the Stephen Lewis Foundation to help Africans with HIV/AIDS. For more information, visit www.stephenlewisfoundation.org or call 416-533-9292.

Camp Timberlane celebrates 50 years

Camp Timberlane, one of the original Jewish summer camps in Ontario, is gearing up to celebrate its 50th anniversary.

Founded by Barry and Philomena Lowes in 1957, the camp, located on Lake of Two Islands in the Haliburton Highlands, was purchased in 2006 by Corey Mandell, owner of Mandell Entertainment, who has been associated with the camp for 28 years.

"I came to camp as a camper at age nine, and was on staff for eight years.

Two years ago, the Lowes approached me about becoming director, and the following year I was given the opportunity to purchase it. That summer camp was my first love, but I never dreamed I would become owner," says Mandell.

To celebrate the camp's anniversary, he says, they have begun reaching out to the community to find the almost 20,000 alumni now living around the world, in order to invite them to two camp reunions being held this spring and summer. The first reunion, for those who cannot make it up to camp, will be help Saturday, May 12 at the Capitol Event Theatre.

"It will feature entertainment and multi-media presentations, and will be an opportunity for alumni to schmooze and reunite with other alumni they may not have seen in years.

"Most of all, however, the reunion will give the almost 650 alumni a chance to pay tribute to Barry and Phil Lowes," says Mandell.

The second reunion is being held at camp the week-end of Aug. 18 and 19, he says. "This week-end will give everyone the chance to come back and experience camp again.

"It will feature camp activities, special programs, campfires, singsongs and a social. Space is limited to 400 guests."

In addition to regular camp activities, including water and land sports, arts and crafts, and dance, for the past two years, there have been a number of new developments at camp including a new skateboard and rollerblade park, an outdoor in-line hockey rink, and an indoor movie theatre.

As well, they have renovated at least one-third of the cabins, and have upgraded the waterfront.

Mandell says they have also begun construction of an alumni village, which will give families a chance to come up while camp is in full swing and enjoy activities. "This will give kids a chance to see how camp is run, and hopefully want to come and be campers," he says.

New campers, he says, now have the opportunity of attending a new week-end program, or a five-day program. "We want campers to feel comfortable about coming to camp."

Camp Timberlane is mainly, but not exclusively Jewish, he says, and Friday evening they hold a Shabbat service and dinner.

For information call Mandell at 416-923-7200, ext. 224 or check out the website at www.camptimberlane.ca

Groups differ on jail term for web hate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish community leaders are at odds over whether a six-month jail sentence given last week to a Montreal man who pleaded guilty to wilfully promoting racial hatred on the Internet is appropriate.

Jean-Sebastien Presseault, 30, is only the second person in Canada to be convicted and sentenced for Internet hate under article 319 of the Criminal Code, which deals with hate propaganda.

Presseault, who has 24 tattoos of neo-Nazi and white-supremacist symbols covering his body, created and operated a website called "hatecore88wp," through a free U.S.-based hosting site, cjb.net. The number 88 is shorthand for "Heil Hitler" and the "wp" stands for white power. The site targeted Jews and especially blacks, and expressed admiration for Hitler, as well as Timothy McVeigh, the executed Oklahoma City bomber.

He was arrested in December 2003, released on bail, and pleaded guilty last June. The maximum penalty for the offence is two years imprisonment. The Crown had asked for one year.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region, chair Jeffrey Boro called the sentence "very severe and exemplary," especially considering that Presseault, 30, was also handed the maximum probation period of three years.

B'nai Brith Canada, however, called the sentence, rendered by Quebec Court justice Martin Vauclair, too lenient, considering that material on the website promoted "murder and genocide."

Moise Moghrabi, Quebec chair of the organization's League for Human Rights, said Presseault should have gotten a penalty close to the two-year limit.

Moghrabi feels this way because of the graphically violent and threatening nature of the material on the site, which he viewed, as well as because of its size (more than 50 pages); the fact it was up for a year; and its reach (more than 300,000 downloads were made of the racist music and videos offered on the site).

With regard to Jews, Moghrabi said the site contained claims that Jews control the world and made statements like "death to Jewry and Zionist tyrants."

In addition, Moghrabi noted that Presseault has a criminal record and has previously served time on (non-hate) charges, including being held for a death threat against the judge in the hate case and possession of an illegal loaded gun in his home.

Presseault will be eligible for mandatory release after two months and, with good behaviour, could get parole after one month, he noted.

Moghrabi, a lawyer, also points to the benchmark 16-month jail sentence given in September to an Alberta man for promoting hatred on the Internet. Reni Sentana-Ries, 63, the former Reinhard Gustav Mueller, was convicted by a jury on one count of promoting hatred against Jews on his website, where he denied the Holocaust and accused Jews of creating diseases such as AIDS and the Ebola virus. The Edmonton Court of Queen's Bench judge also prohibited him from using the Internet for three years afterward.

Boro, a criminal lawyer, said he was unaware of the Alberta case and was surprised when told of the 16-month sentence.

Boro, who never saw Presseault's website, pointed out that Vauclair had little choice but to give the sentence he did, because if Presseault offends again or breaches his release conditions, the judge would have to give a stiffer penalty.

In addition, Boro noted that a judge has to "leave a margin of manoeuvrability" for sentencing in any future hate-crime convictions. If such cases become more common, judges would likel increase sentences to act as a deterrent.

Vauclair described the content on Presseault's site, which included degrading "cartoons" of blacks and games with the goal of killing blacks, as "vile, despicable and nauseating." In handing down a prison term, Vauclair said he took into account Presseault's violent history and the risk that he may reoffend. On the other hand, he also considered that there is a possibility Presseault will be rehabilitated and that the site did not affect anyone directly.

Conditions of Presseault's probation include no access to the Internet or contact with racist of extremist groups. Presseault was never linked to any particular group.

Presseault minimized the seriousness of his crimes, saying his activities had caused no harm to society, and he never apologized. He only regretted praising McVeigh.

His lawyer had asked for a three-month sentence served in the community. He noted that Presseault, who was on welfare when he was arrested, has changed his ideology and is trying to turn his life around. He is in a relationship, has a two-year-old daughter and wants to work in his father's company.

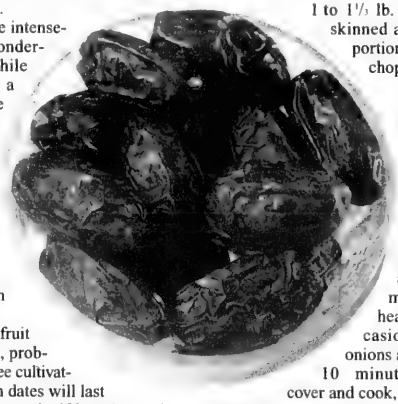
Food, Scrumptious Food

Use dates and figs for Tu b'Shvat

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat is celebrated as the birthday of the trees with a symbolic eating of fruits and nuts. For the cook in me, it's all about using my fig and date recipes.



Dried figs are intensely sweet and wonderfully chewy, while fresh figs have a more subtle sweetness. When buying packages of dried figs, check for unbroken wrapping – the figs should give slightly when gently squeezed through the package.

Dates are the fruit of the date palm, probably the oldest tree cultivated by man. Fresh dates will last for one to three months if kept in an airtight container and up to six months if stored in an airtight container in the refrigerator. They can also be frozen. Dates and figs can be used in a variety of sweet and savoury dishes, and the following recipes should help you get started on creating a few new family favourites.

FIG AND PISTACHIO COUSCOUS

2¼ cups water
1½ tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. salt
1 box couscous
1½ cups figs, thinly sliced
1¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground allspice
½ cup shelled pistachios, chopped
¼ cup chopped green onions
¼ cup thinly sliced fresh basil

Combine 2¼ cups water, oil and salt in a medium saucepan and bring to a boil. Remove from heat, and stir in the couscous, figs and spices. Cover; let stand until water is absorbed, about 5 minutes. Transfer to a large bowl and fluff with a fork. Cool completely. Stir in nuts, green onions and basil. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes approximately 7 cups.

ROASTED SALMON WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS, FIGS AND RED WINE

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 lb. yellow onions, halved and thinly sliced to measure 4 cups
salt
1 cup figs, stemmed and halved
½ cup red or white wine
½ cup pareve chicken or vegetable broth
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary or 1 tsp. dried rosemary
freshly ground black pepper
1 to 1½ lb. salmon filet, skinned and cut into 4 portions chopped parsley

Swirl olive oil in bottom of medium nonstick skillet. Add onions and sprinkle with ½ tsp. salt. Cover and cook over medium-low heat, stirring occasionally until onions are soft, about 10 minutes. Remove cover and cook, stirring often, until onions are golden, 15 to 20 minutes. Stir in figs, wine, broth, vinegar and fresh rosemary. Increase heat to high and simmer until sauce thickens, about 5 minutes. Add salt and pepper to taste. Keep warm.

Preheat oven to 450. Sprinkle salmon with salt and pepper to taste. Place the filets on lightly oiled heavy baking sheet. Roast for 7 to 10 minutes or until fish flakes. Sprinkle salmon with parsley. Serve over fig sauce. Serves 4.

DATE BARS

½ cup butter or margarine at room temperature
1 cup light brown sugar, firmly packed
3 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
8 oz. finely chopped dried dates (about 1½ cups)
1 cup chopped pecans or walnuts, optional

In a large mixing bowl, using a handheld electric mixer, cream butter and brown sugar. Add eggs and vanilla and beat well. Into a separate bowl, sift flour, baking powder and salt. Gradually blend dry ingredients into the creamed mixture.

Stir in chopped dates and the chopped pecans or walnuts, if using. Pour into greased 13 x 9 x 2-in. baking pan. Bake at 350 for 25 minutes. Cool; cut into bars. Makes about 24 date bars.

Suicide bomber kills three in attack on Eilat bakery

Haaretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A suicide bomber killed at least three people Monday morning when he blew himself up in a bakery in the southern resort city of Eilat.

Authorities said that another person was wounded, but not seriously, in the attack at a shopping centre in a residential neighbourhood. This was the first ever suicide bombing in the city.

"This was a suicide bombing and the bomber is one of the dead. He apparently entered with a bag or an explosives belt and blew himself up inside the shop," Eilat police told Army Radio.

"Three people and the bomber were killed," confirmed police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld.

Police cordoned off the area, and Eilat police chief Bruno Stein said police believed there could be more bombers in the city.

"Our assumption is that it's not one bomber, and there might be more bombers in Eilat right now," Stein said. The emergency services raised their alert level to the highest.

It took police close to an hour to determine that the explosion had been caused by a bomb, and not a gas leak, as initially believed.

Police believe that the explosive device weighed some four to eight kilograms. The residue from the device covered much of the bakery, and police are investigating whether the blast was caused by a technical fault.

Shattered glass and bread still in trays were scattered outside the shop as ambulance crews and police swarmed the residential street.

Popular resort for Israelis and foreigners

The militant Islamic Jihad organization and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades – linked to Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement – both claimed responsibility for the attack.

The ruling Hamas movement said that the attack was a "natural response" to Israel's policies.

A senior Israel Defence Forces officer told Ha'aretz that the bomber, 21-year-old Mohammed al-Saqsaq of Gaza, entered Eilat through the border with Egypt, several dozen kilometers northwest of Eilat. Based on the examination of the body, it appears he entered Israel several days ago, and made his way to Eilat on foot.

Islamic Jihad had said earlier that the bomber had set out from the West Bank, and reached Eilat via Jordan, after seven months of preparation. Jordan has denied that the bomber entered through its territory.

The previously unknown group "Army of Believers" also said that it carried out the attack.

Fatah spokesperson Ahmad Abdul Rahman condemned the bombing, saying, "We are against any operation that targets civilians, Israelis or Palestinians."

David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office, told Ha'aretz earlier that "At this stage, it is unclear what the origin of the attack is. Israel as a nation is continually confronting terrorism and terrorist threats. Israel is always on guard against such attacks, and is compelled to do so."

Eilat, some 350 kilometres south of Jerusalem, is bordered by Egypt and Jordan.

"We are still trying to determine where the suicide bomber came from and the precise details as to his route of attack," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said.

Government spokesperson Miri Eisen said it was too soon to predict Israel's response to the attack.

"Israel does not know what the origin of the attack was, and it is a little premature to say what Israel's response will be," she told Sky News.

Eilat Mayor Meir Yitzhak Halevi told Israel Radio that the victims of the attack were likely to be local residents and not tourists.

"It's without a doubt a terrible incident that the town of Eilat is not accustomed to," Halevi said. "The thought that infiltrators could enter Eilat alive and disrupt the running of the town is very worrying."

The attack is also the first suicide bombing since April, when a suicide bomber blew himself up at the old central bus station in Tel Aviv, killing nine people.

Eilat, at the northern tip of the Red Sea, is a popular resort for Israelis and foreign holidaymakers, and has largely been spared the violence of the past six years, since the intifadah erupted.

Israel Radio reported that Egyptian security forces on Sunday arrested a would-be suicide bomber in northern Sinai who had left a note for his parents saying that he intended to carry out a suicide attack inside Israel.

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2007 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 16, 2007. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 23, 2007.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 1, 2007. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Katsav faces charges

Attorney General Mazuz reached his decision after a six-month police investigation. Considering that legal proceedings would likely last well beyond July, when Katsav's seven-year tenure as president ends, Israeli pundits were unanimous in demanding that he resign now.

"Resignation, not temporary incapacitation or any other ruse, is what is needed now in order to save what is left of the institution of the presidency, and in order to return the scandal to its proper proportions," Nahum Barnea wrote in Yediot. "In doing so, Moshe Katsav the man will do a great service, perhaps a final service, to Israel's society and sanity."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert joined the calls for Katsav to resign, saying, "There is no doubt in my mind that the president cannot continue to fulfil his position, and he must leave the President's Residence."

Katsav bitterly criticized the media last week for what he called a "lynch" and "media court" that he said has reached every house in Israel over the past six months.

Earlier, Katsav informed Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik, who will take his place for now, of his decision to step down.

His announcement came shortly after 27 lawmakers signed a petition authorizing the Knesset house committee to prepare an impeachment motion.

On Monday, Knesset house committee chair Ruhama Avraham was to submit for the committee's approval the procedure for debate on Katsav's dismissal.

A majority of 19 out of 25 is required to pass a house committee resolution to dismiss Katsav. Once approved, the motion to dismiss the president would be brought before the Knesset, and a 90-MK majority (two-thirds of the 120 seats in parliament) is required to make the dismissal effective.

Since the presidency is a ceremonial role in Israel, the case has no direct bearing on Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, himself mired in an inquiry about his leadership of last year's war against Lebanon's Hezbollah militia and two police investigations into alleged graft and bribery.

But for many Israelis, it's yet another signal that rot goes deep in the halls of power.

A Haifa University poll found that just seven per cent of Israelis feel "great" or "very great" confidence in Katsav, while 79 per cent feel "little" or "very little" confidence in him. The figures closely mirrored surveys on the plunging popularity of Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz since the Lebanon war.

Olmert had no immediate comment on Katsav's legal travails, but Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni left no doubt on her views.

"From a legal standpoint, Moshe Katsav the individual is indeed to be presumed innocent," said Livni, who is also acting justice minister. "However, given the nature and gravity of the accusations in this case and the timing of the decision, it would be more appropriate for him to promote his innocence from outside of the President's Residence."

Katsav's hearing on the charges of rape and breach of trust is now expected to begin within two months, sooner than was previously thought, Ha'aretz reported Monday.

MacKay slams Hamas, Iran at conference

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Peter MacKay wasn't making any apologies for refusing to meet with representatives of Hamas, despite the fact the terror group holds power in the Palestinian Authority.

"There has been criticism in Canada of my visit here for snubbing Hamas officials by refusing to meet with them," the Canadian foreign minister said in a Jan. 22 address to the main assembly at the seventh annual Herzliya Conference. He said that as a representative of the first country to suspend contact with the Hamas government, "when it comes to standing against terrorism, that's criticism I am willing to take."

MacKay spoke at the prestigious four-day gathering, held Jan. 21 to 24, as part of a week-long, first-time visit to the Middle East that ended Jan. 23. The conference was held by the Institute for Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

MacKay met with his Israeli counterpart Tzipi Livni, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit. He also visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem, the Canada Center in Metulla, and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) office in Bethlehem.

However, MacKay turned down an invitation to meet with his PA counterpart from Hamas, Mahmoud Zahar, who later complained that Canada's "extremist" Conservative government showed no respect for democracy because of its boycott of Hamas.

Hamas, which took over the PA cabinet and legislature after elections last year, has rejected international calls to renounce violence and accept Israel.

MacKay's speech at the Herzliya Conference was the highlight of his tour. After defending his stance against Hamas, he moved on to the subject of Iran.

"Canada is deeply concerned with the direction Iran is heading in. With no doubt that Israel would be [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's first target... the regime in Iran cannot be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons," he said to a cheering crowd, which included Canadian MP Irwin Cotler, Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) chair Moshe Ronen, Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz, former CIA director James Woolsey and other distinguished academics, politicians, and military officials from around the world who gathered at the conference to exchange their views on issues affecting Israel's security, foreign policy, economics and education.

Peter MacKay

"We need to begin to talk seriously and creatively about what the international community can and will do... to prevent the need for military action [against Iran]. Canada takes the position that all non-military options, including voluntary sanctions, must be explored, and explored widely," MacKay said. "While effective military capability is vital, it is not the only instrument by any means for achieving long-term change."

He said the same philosophy should be applied to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The way to ensure Israel's security and prosperity is the creation of a viable and peaceful state of Palestine. Palestinians need a state, Israel needs security, and the two are intricately linked," he said, explaining that Canada still supports a two-state solution, despite the wrench that election of Hamas to office has thrown into the peace process.

"The potential for Palestinians to build a progressive and dynamic society is there. But just as there is real potential for success of a peaceful and moderate Palestinian state, we must be realistic about the potential for failure," he said. "Without the Palestinians assuming responsibility for security internally, and by extension offering security to its neighbour Israel, progress will not be possible."

He said that recent talks between Olmert and Abbas and Olmert's recent pledge of $100 million (US) to the PA are encouraging, but he added that there was still more Israel can do.

"At border crossings, Israel should take away the arbitrariness of the system, and while maintaining security, treat Palestinians with respect and dignity; issue work permits; and permit trade and transit between Gaza and the West Bank."

On that score, MacKay reminded audience members of Canada's recent commitment of $1.2 million to improve conditions at Karni Crossing between Gaza and Israel.

In a meeting with Livni the day before his speech, MacKay also criticized the route of Israel's separation barrier along the border with the West Bank, clarifying that although he supported its construction in principle, he opposed its current route on the grounds that it could be could be interpreted as a permanent border.

"Canada seeks fairness and justice and dignity for the people of Israel," he said. "But we also seek it for the Palestinians."

At the same time, MacKay said that Canada's first priority is to support Israel's right to defend itself.

"Canada recognizes, first and foremost, that the government of Israel has a duty to protect its citizens," he said. "It's the first task of any responsible government to do so."

MacKay said that Afghanistan, which he visited last month, has given Canada a much more acute understanding of this need. Several Canadian diplomats, aid workers, and some 2,500 soldiers are stationed in southern Afghanistan near the border with Pakistan, and 44 Canadian soldiers and one diplomat have been killed there to date.

Bunkers destroyed

The Israeli army last Friday bombed two underground Hezbollah bunkers on Israel's side of the Lebanese border fence. The bunkers, one found during Israel's summer war with Hezbollah and the other found Jan. 24, housed food, supplies and tools for a long stay, Ha'aretz reported.

Terrorist killed

An Islamic Jihad leader in Nablus was killed during an Israeli raid. Fadel Balawneh broke his neck when he fell from a second-story window Jan. 25 as Israeli troops were shooting at his house. It wasn't clear if he was shot to death or if the fall killed him..

Women fight bus policy

Orthodox novelist Naomi Ragen is leading efforts by Israeli women to end sexual segregation on some bus lines in Israel. Ragen and five other women petitioned Israel's High Court of Justice last week to order the national bus lines not to accept haredi demands that female commuters sit in the back and dress modestly. The largest bus firm, Egged, says 30 of its lines are segregated by gender at the passengers' request. Ragen said she was spurred by the experience of being ordered to the back of a bus by a male passenger, and the driver didn't defend her. "I got off the bus with the dreadful, dreadful feeling that in my country I have to take a public bus home that is under Taliban rule," she said.

Livni meets Abbas

Tzipi Livni and Mahmoud Abbas met on the sidelines of an international economic conference in Switzerland. Aides to the Israeli foreign minister and Palestinian Authority president said they discussed ways to restart peace talks when they met Jan. 24 at the World Economic Forum in Davos. Earlier, Livni told the forum that "A Palestinian state is not an illusion. It's there, it's achievable, while" Abbas said, "I am fully convinced that despite all the difficulties, an atmosphere conducive to the resumption of the peace process exists."

Polish dissident wins prize

A Pole won an Israeli literary prize. This year's Jerusalem Prize will go to Leszek Kolakowski in recognition of his critiques of the repressive aspects of Soviet Communism and his championing of human liberty. The prestigious literary prize will be presented at this month's Jerusalem International Book Fair. Born in 1927, Kolakowski earned a doctorate from Warsaw University and went on to serve on the faculties of Harvard, Oxford and the University of Chicago before retiring in 1995. Past recipients of the prize include Bertrand Russell, Arthur Miller, and Susan Sontag. Some recipients went on to receive the Nobel Prize for literature, including V.S. Naipaul and J.M. Coetzee.

Yad Vashem honours Arab

A Tunisian farmer was the first Arab nominated for Yad Vashem's Righteous Gentile designation. The efforts of Khaled Abd al-Wahab, a Tunisian farmer who died in 1997, were discovered by historian Robert Satloff. Some 60 Muslims are among the more than 20,000 Righteous Gentiles already named by the Holocaust museum and memorial in Jerusalem, but no Arabs. Satloff, executive director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, attributed this to historians' lack of research and to some Arab rescuers' desire not to be found, since the Shoah, which made plain the Jews' need for a state, is now a touchy subject in the Arab world. Survivor Anny Boukris told Satloff how Wahab hid her and 24 relatives on his farm. Boukris, who was 11 at the time, said Wahab risked his life when he stopped a German officer from raping her mother. Satloff interviewed witnesses who verified Boukris' testimony.

Gilda's Club to open centres in Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Gilda's Club, an organization that provides drop-in centres and psychological, emotional and educational support for people fighting cancer and their families, is planning to expand to Israel.

Gilda's Israel Project is being led by Torontonian Menachem Mendel Meir Meister, with Linda Rechtsman, Helen Burstyn, Lorna Rosenstein, Ricki Harris and Barry Bernstein. All have been active in Gilda's Club Toronto. Meister is also creating Canadian Friends of Gilda's Club in Toronto, but hopes to establish such organizations in many cities with large Jewish populations.

"Israel is the centre of the world, not just for Jews, but for other faiths too," he said, adding that just as Gilda's Clubs in the United States and Canada serve those of all ethnic and religious backgrounds, so will the ones planned for Israel offer services to Jews, Arabs and Christians. "Just as cancer doesn't discriminate, we shouldn't either. It is also one of the only organizations that serve men, women, teenagers and children alike."

The first meeting of Canadian Friends of Gilda's Club was held recently, and Meister said those attending were enthusiastic. One suggestion that came out of the meeting was not to establish clubs in big cities, as has been the case in North America, but to have them on kibbutzim or moshavim near population centres.

Meister first went through the red door of Gilda's Club in May 2005, shortly after he was diagnosed with breast cancer. (He has since been diagnosed with prostate cancer.) Even then, he recalled, he declared that he wanted to bring the organization to Israel.

Gilda Radner

What he especially likes about Gilda's Club is its focus on laughter and fostering a positive attitude about cancer. For instance, he said, the positive aspects can bring together families that were estranged or had a tense relationship and make them realize the bonds between them. Laughter, he said, releases endorphins and thus helps people deal with the situation. This is actually is said to promote healing.

Gilda's Club was founded in memory of Gilda Radner, a popular comedienne and member of the original cast of Saturday Night Live. She died in 1989 of ovarian cancer at the age of 42. Her husband, Gene Wilder, and several friends, including actor Mandy Patinkin, wanted a place to help cancer patients and their families and friends relax, and get the support they need, in an atmosphere that reflects what Radner had found important during her fight against her illness.

Meister, who considers that helping others gives meaning to suffering, is involved in many cancer-related projects. He does outreach for Gilda's Club to the community and especially to medical and hospital personnel. "I encourage them to tell their patients about Gilda's Club, and take part in the lectures, workshops and support groups there."

He is involved in developing a documentary or feature film on cancer ("I think that a feature film would garner more attention"), and is creating a manual to help other people establish clubs in their area.

He tries to encourage co-operation with other cancer-support organizations, such as Willow and Wellsprings, as well as hospitals or cancer centres, to make services available as seamlessly as possible. "We want them to work together, and not see the other as competition."

And he is now trying to build a team in Israel that will raise funds and operate local clubs there.

For more information about Gilda's Club or Gilda's Israel Project, call Meister at 416-789-9047, or e-mail gildas.israel.project@gmail.com.

David and the Honey Jars

adapted from the midrash

David led the sheep across the green meadows. Finding a lush patch of grass, he stopped the herds, and they began to graze. This was David's favourite part of the day. While the sheep ate, he was free to play his harp and sing songs of praise to God. He plucked the strings of his harp, his eyes raised to the clear blue sky, his voice rising in song.

Suddenly he realized someone was standing behind him. He broke off, abruptly.

There was an elderly woman standing there. "No, young man, keep playing, don't mind me. Your songs are so beautiful." There were tears in her eyes.

"Why are you crying?" asked David.

Her face darkened. "It's a long story. A sweet boy like you shouldn't know about these things."

"No, please tell me. Maybe I can help you."

She smiled ruefully. "I'll tell you. My husband died a few years ago. We had no children, and I was left alone on his large estate. He left me houses, fields, vineyards, but there was nothing for me do with them. It was so terribly lonely there, you have no idea…I wanted to move back to the city where I grew up. I sold everything. I was left with bags of gold coins instead of our beautiful estate…my husband would have wanted me to do it. I wanted to go back to my birthplace to buy a home there, but I was too afraid to travel alone with all the gold coins. So I hatched a plan. A good one. At least it seemed so at the time." She sighed.

"I bought a bunch of clay pitchers and filled them with honey. I went to a friend of my late husband and asked him if he would watch my honey for me while I was out of town. He agreed, and let me put the pitchers in his cellar. What he didn't know was that under the honey were all the gold coins. I knew he had a weakness for money, so I didn't want to entrust him with the coins, but jugs of honey? He would never guess what's inside, and he's not the type to steal a jug of honey. At least that's what I thought." She sighed again.

David looked up. "So what happened?"

"I don't know. I was away for a few months, until I found a house for myself. And when I came back for my honey, that's all that was in the jugs. Honey. Just honey." Her voice broke.

"So take him to court!" shouted David.

"I did. The judges asked if I had witnesses who saw me give him the gold coins. And of course I didn't. That was the whole idea. It was supposed to be a secret. And now, here I am. Penniless, broken, wandering the fields of Israel."

David paced back and forth, his young face wrinkled in thought.

"Maybe I can help," he muttered.

"No, no. I even went to King Saul, but there was nothing he could do for me. But I appreciate your listening to my story. Don't worry about me. Go back to playing your harp. Your melodies are truly lovely."

"No!" burst out David. "I will help you! Tell me, do you still have the jugs of honey?"

The woman laughed mirthlessly. "Yes, I do. As if that will do me any good."

"Then let us go back to King Saul. I have an idea."

David looked very small in the enormous throne room of the king of Israel.

"This case has already been tried," declared King Saul, "and no evidence has been offered to indict Eliezer. In fact, it would seem that Eliezer was doing an act of kindness in agreeing to watch the honey."

"Your Majesty, if I may ask Eliezer a few questions," asked David.

"Proceed."

"Eliezer, are these the jugs of honey that this woman gave you to watch?"

"Yes."

"Are you sure?"

"Definitely. In fact, they are still filled with the same honey. Not money." He smiled.

David walked over to the pitchers. He picked one up, and without warning hurled it to the floor. Honey cascaded over the clay shards and onto the marble floor of the courtroom. Everyone watched in shock as David examined the broken pieces of clay. Dissatisfied, he smashed another pitcher. And another. He was dripping with gooey, sticky honey, when he suddenly cried out, "Aha!"

He raised a clay fragment. A gleaming golden coin was stuck onto it.

"It looks like these jars had more than honey in them!" Everyone turned to Eliezer, who melted under their harsh looks.

"I didn't mean to," he cried out. "I needed honey for my daughter's wedding, and I borrowed some from the pitchers, and I saw the money inside…and I didn't know how I was going to pay for the wedding, and I thought..."

"Enough!" bellowed the king. "Take him away! Make him pay back in full!" He turned to David, and his features softened. "So, young man, what is your name?"

"David — son of Jesse. I am just a shepherd."

"Just a shepherd? You have quite a future ahead of you, David. Quite a future."

After the death of Saul, David became King of Israel. But that's another story!

Canadian's film focuses on Israeli Arabs

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In the world of documentary films, it isn't unusual to see Israel depicted in an unflattering light.

Whether it's the conflict with the Palestinians or the larger quagmire in the Middle East, the Jewish state is frequently portrayed negatively.

Ron Furman: Passionate about social issues.

Ron Furman, a Thornhill-based filmmaker, is doing his part to buck this trend.

"I'm not saying Israel is perfect, but the image of it [portrayed in films] is far from the truth," says the 28-year-old owner of Thorn Films Inc.

"I want to be that person who can show the positives."

To that end, one of Furman's recent projects is a film titled Disengaged From Reality, which focuses the spotlight on an often overlooked group, Israeli Arabs and their perspectives on Israel's disengagement from Gaza.

"There are 21 [real-life] Israeli Arab characters in the film, from all aspects of society, and we interviewed them before the disengagement to see what they think disengagement will lead to," says Furman, who was born in Haifa and moved to Canada at age 10.

"Most of them were in favour of disengagement and most of them were pro-Israel."

Furman and partner Zohar Romm are working toward showcasing the documentary in various film festivals.

While many of Furman's films take an atypical approach to covering Israel, he points out he is not a propagandist.

"I don't want people to watch my films so that they will think like me – I just want them to think," he says.

"As long as they leave the film and discuss its issues… then I can sleep at night knowing I've done something positive."

The genesis of Furman's flair for film begins in Israel, when, as a seven-year-old, he started acting in theatrical productions.

Shortly after arriving in Canada, Furman continued to pursue his passion.

"When I moved here, I didn't speak English, but I wanted to be the Tin Man in the Wizard of Oz, so I learned English for the show," he recalls.

Furman studied broadcasting and television at Seneca College-York University and like many aspiring actors, headed off to Hollywood where he enjoyed some success in the late 1990s, garnering comedy and drama awards from the International Model and Talent Association.

He returned home and spent a few years as the "second in command" with Chutzpah Productions, before launching Thorn Films in 2003.

Over the years, he has worked on more than 50 films, most of which delve into poignant social and political issues.

These days, the busy documentary creator is working on and promoting several projects, including Mon Amie, a story about a nine-year-old French-Canadian who befriends a Ukrainian Jewish boy in Manitoba, as well The Art of Combat, a television program exploring the martial arts.

Looking ahead, Furman is seeking to blend what's pragmatic with his passion.

"I don't want to be a millionaire – I just want to continue doing what I'm good at, which is making films and telling people's stories," he says.

"I'm passionate about the social issues in my films, and I hope other people who watch them feel the same way."

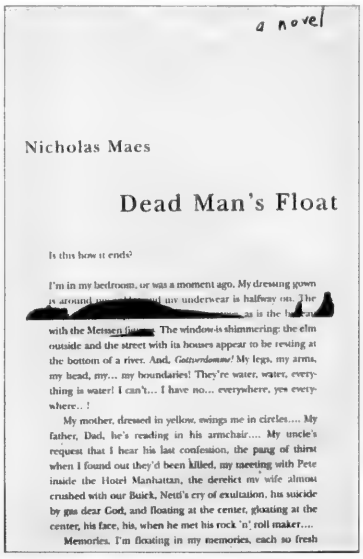
Dead Man's Float

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In his first novel, Dead Man's Float, (Véhicule Press) Nicholas Maes intertwines several themes – memory, family relationships, the Holocaust, religion.

He also presents us with a mystery by the end of the story – could an apparently ordinary, middle-class man have been responsible for the death of a popular international rock star?

The main character in Maes' insightful and emotive novel is Nathan Gelder who has suffered a stroke. The 70-year-old, whose mother was Jewish and father a Dutch protestant, floats in and out of consciousness.



a novel
Nicholas Maes
Dead Man's Float
Is this how it ends?
I'm in my bedroom, or was a moment ago. My dressing gown is around my ankles and my underwear is halfway on. The with the Meissen figurine. The window is shimmering; the elm outside and the street with its houses appear to be resting at the bottom of a river. And, Gottverdomme! My legs, my arms, my head, my... my boundaries! They're water, water, everything is water! I can't... I have no... everywhere, yes everywhere.. !
My mother, dressed in yellow, swings me in circles.... My father, Dad, he's reading in his armchair.... My uncle's request that I hear his last confession, the pang of thirst when I found out they'd been killed, my meeting with Pete inside the Hotel Manhattan, the derelict my wife almost crushed with our Buick, Netti's cry of exultation, his suicide by gas dear God, and floating at the center, gloating at the center, his face, his, when he met his rock 'n' roll maker....
Memories. I'm floating in my memories, each so fresh

Born in Holland and left in 1940 while the country was still at peace. His parents had a bad feeling about their future there and decided to send their 10 year old son to a wealthy relative in Canada.

While in a stupor and a state of paralysis in a Toronto hospital, Nathan at times revisits parts of his life in flashbacks to his childhood and earlier adult life.

Still, despite his immobility and wandering mind, he can hear his family's discussions when they visit him, as well as the comments of the hospital staff.

It becomes clear that Nathan is deeply troubled by the memory of his parents, who perished in the Holocaust. Although he has gone on to live a middle class family life working as an interpreter, his loss is deep and impairs his ability to put it behind him and to cope with life.

With emotion, he recalls how his father choked back his tears as he embraced Nathan at Rotterdam, where he took his son onto the ship.

"My father, the man who'd brought home pastries from work, the righteous gentile among a crop of crazy Jews. The last time I'd see him. The very last."

During his submersion into memory, he presents a scenario that points to his possible involvement in the death of the rock star, and the question of whether this could have happened is dealt with in the last part of the novel.

Maes grew up in Montreal. He had a gentile mother and a Dutch Jewish father. When Maes was 10 year old, his father moved the family to Holland, but they returned to Canada when he was 13. His mother died of cancer a year and a half after they arrived in Canada.

When he was 21, he came into a small inheritance and spent time cycling around Greece. "That's when I started keeping a journal and writing short snatches of fiction," he says.

At the university, he studied Greek and Latin and received a doctorate on his studies on Homer. At age 28, Maes converted to Judaism.

He teaches classics at the University of Waterloo and history at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto in Richmond Hill, Ont. He has written short stories which appeared in The Fiddlehead and Dalhousie Review.

When asked what he hoped to achieve when he wrote Dead Man's Float, Maes said, "Like many Jewish modern writers, I have a morbid fascination with the Holocaust. The sheer influence of the Holocaust, as far as modern politics and culture are concerned, is incalculably great and a source of endless speculation.

"My father was in Holland during the war. I'd grown up with his stories. I was well acquainted with the history of this period and wanted to work this material into some fictional format. Therefore, the Holocaust was a natural choice of topic when I considered exactly what it was I wanted to concentrate my literary efforts on. But I didn't want to write a conventional Holocaust tale.

"My own interest was more a matter of exploring the implications of this disaster on our popular culture now."

FRIENDS OF YIDDISH TO RE-SCREEN FILM ABOUT THE YIDDISH FORVERTS

Technical glitches recently prevented Friends of Yiddish from screening a film about the historic Forverts (Forward) Yiddish daily newspaper. Instead, Toronto translator Vivienne Felsen stepped in at the last minute with an entertaining program on the world of our immigrant parents and grandparents, based on the writings of her grandfather, Israel Medres, late of Montreal.

FOY has announced it will show The Forward: From Immigrants to Americans later this month in a joint program with the Toronto Workmen's Circle in commemoration of the 110th anniversary of the Forward's founding.

The film is a warm, intriguing and sometimes humorous look at the landmark Yiddish daily and its leaders from its inception in 1897, through its heyday in the 1920s, when it was a vital source of news, advice and instruction for hundreds of thousands of Yiddish-speaking immigrants, and beyond.

At its height, the Forward commanded a readership of some 250,000 and was considered one of America's major metropolitan newspapers. Today, it has a much smaller circulation but is still considered an important medium (along with its English-language and even Russian-language counterparts) for Jewish readers.

The screening is at Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. Guests $5, members of FOY or Workmen's Circle, free. Sunday, Feb. 18, 2:30 p.m.

Names in the News: Toronto impresario Garth Drabinsky, who recently sold the CBC on Triple Sensation, a new talent-hunting reality TV show, is expected in Halifax on Feb. 10 to judge auditions in the Neptune Theatre. The contest will eventually reward some starry-eyed young hopeful (between 18 and 26) with a $150,000 scholarship, courtesy of the Canadian taxpayer.

Drabinsky, producer of Ragtime, Show Boat and Kiss of the Spider Woman, is one of five adjudicators (along with actor Cynthia Dale and composer Marvin Hamlisch) to cast their discerning and privileged eyes over the auditioning throngs in search of the performer whose singing, acting and dancing is supreme.

"It's not just where you are today, it's where we project you in the future," Drabinsky told the Halifax Chronicle-Herald.

Some 2,000 preliminary try-outs are planned or have already taken place in cities across Canada, but the show – most likely due entirely to Drabinsky's involvement – has even been getting some media attention down south.

"If Triple Sensation becomes a long-running hit, Mr. Drabinsky might end up providing some of the drama himself," the New York Times observed, noting that our high-flying and irrepressible Icarus still faces fraud charges both here and in the United States related to the sale of his former company, Livent.

Wiesenthal Documentary: Produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Moriah Films and narrated by Nicole Kidman, the feature documentary I Have Never Forgotten You – The Life and Legacy of Simon Wiesenthal examines the life and deeds of the legendary Nazi hunter who died in September 2005 at age 96.

According to Rabbi Marvin Hier, Wiesenthal often told him he believed "all the Nazis, even those who were never caught, slept less because they knew I was out there and that maybe one day the knock would come on their door. Wiesenthal used to say, "When my life is over and I meet up with the six million, I will be proud to say to them, 'I have never forgotten you.'"

The Friends of the SWC present three different showings of the film: At Silver City Richmond Hill, 8725 Yonge St. (at Hwy. 7), Sunday, Feb. 11, 7:30 p.m.; at the Varsity Cinema, 55 Bloor St. W. Jews come up mostly empty in Oscar race

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — If there's a Jewish cabal that supposedly runs Hollywood, it sure did a lousy job promoting its own for Academy Award nominations.

Where in past years one could at least count on a Steven Spielberg film or a Holocaust documentary to provide Jewish flavour, this year's pickings were slim when the Oscar hopefuls were announced last week.

However, there were three consolation prizes:

Alan (middle name Wolf) Arkin received an Oscar nomination in the supporting actor category for his role as Grandpa, the heroin-snorting, womanizing family patriarch in Little Miss Sunshine.

The 72-year-old actor, director, author and musician holds the distinction of having been nominated for an Oscar in his very first screen appearance in 1966 in The Russians Are Coming, The Russians Are Coming.

Two years later he was nominated again for his role in The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter.

In a past interview, Arkin observed, "Well, I've always been a character actor, I've never been a leading man. It gave me an opportunity not to have to take my clothes off all the time."

Borat only got one nomination.

Despite a flood of shrewd publicity, Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan won only one nomination for the faux journalist's creator, Sacha Baron Cohen.

The British comedian was named in the adapted screenplay category — who knew there even was a screenplay? — along with co-writers Anthony Hines, Peter Baynham and Dan Mazer.

And finally there's the real dark-horse nomination of West Bank Story in the short film-live action category.

Director Ari Sandel tags his work as "A little singing, a little dancing, a lot of hummus."

A review in the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles two years ago lauded "the very funny film featuring an all-singing, all-dancing cast. In it, the Israeli boy and the Palestinian girl join hands and hearts to settle a bitter rivalry between their families' competing West Bank falafel stands."

More than a love letter to Montreal

Translating Montreal: Episodes in the Life of a Divided City* by Sherry Simon, McGill-Queen's University Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Among the many in-jokes hidden in Leonard Cohen's Beautiful Losers is a detail uncovered as the novel's narrator takes a crosstown walk from Montreal's port and along Sherbrooke Street. Heading west, he stumbles upon a nationalist rally at "the corner of Parc Lafontaine Park." To the uninitiated, this name might appear as a typo, when it is, in fact, a distinctive Montrealism – the doubled name made up to please the speakers of two languages. In 1966, when the novel appeared, this kind of redundancy in the service of a would-be bilingualism had yet to become a sign of political and cultural one-upmanship.

Norman Ravvin

Sherry Simon's Translating Montreal: Episodes in the Life of a Divided City, is a far-reaching exploration of the crosstown walks taken by the likes of journalist Malcolm Reid, poet and novelist A.M. Klein and activist-poet and teacher F.R. Scott.

With these portraits, she aims to take the measure of the changing status of language, literature and translation in the city since World War II. For those who don't know Montreal well, Simon provides both a love letter to her city, and a historical walking guide for understanding how French, English and Yiddish have affected one another on streets where "intimate otherness" has been the norm, but where a new variety of boulevardier has appeared, "the bilingual, often trilingual, individual who navigates the entire city with ease."

Malcolm Reid marched east, in order to investigate the mid-1960s parti pris scene, the development of a new nationalist intellectual and writerly class, and to evoke the flavour of joual, the characteristic French of working-class east-end Montreal.

His book, The Shouting Signpainters: A Literary and Political Account of Quebec Revolutionary Nationalism, evokes this eastward walk at just the time that Cohen's narrator found his way to Parc Lafontaine Park.

Reid's crosstown walk is, in Simon's view, a more successful version of F.R. Scott's efforts, through soirées at his Westmount home, to attract francophone writers to the west side of the city.

In Klein's poetry, she finds an exemplary effort to create a literature open to both the city's main language communities. In some of his better known work, Klein employed a vocabulary that straddled French and English, in the hope that poems like his Montreal or Parade of St. Jean Baptiste would be readable for speakers of each language.

One of the phenomena described in Translating Montreal that will likely be news to non-Montrealers is the work of Pierre Anctil, who has translated a number of volumes of Yiddish poetry, memoir and fiction into French. Simon describes Anctil's efforts as a "gesture of hospitality, the arm extended in welcome," and suggests that they signify a moment when the "Jewish history of Montreal leaves the exclusive purview of anglophone historians to enter the domain of francophone social scientists."

In her concluding pages, Simon asks, "Has Yiddish effectively entered the francophone world?" It remains to be seen if Anctil's labours are evidence of a singular passion or something more broadly influential.

Translating Montreal has a strong utopian undercurrent. As a guiding image, Simon borrows another author's description of the ideal café: "intimate yet inviting, a place like home yet anonymous, where stories can be overheard or exchanged, where all are admitted."

If the city of Montreal cannot be fairly described this way, then, according to Simon, it is the mountain that gives it its name that can be seen as its "purest shared" space, a "place of conversation" that stands "beyond the city's historic divisions." The notion of the mountain standing in for a place "where all are admitted" calls for some forceful reinterpretation of the role of the giant lighted cross at its top.

As Simon completes her own crosstown wanderings, she presents the cross as no longer being a religious symbol. Rather, as a marker above the mountain's meandering walkways, it is viewed as a "symbol of civic pride."

Such an imagined narrative is light years away from Cohen's mid-'60s tableau of a maddened crowd intent on seeing their names inscribed "on the passport of a new Laurentian Republic." Simon's crosstown walk ends atop the mountain, with a sweeping view of the surrounding neighbourhoods, which assert for her the "task and reward" of difference alongside dialogue.

Norman Ravvin's books include A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory and Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Son of immigrants edits book on Canadian identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Five years ago, when he was an overseas graduate student, Irvin Studin stumbled upon What is a Jew?, a book of essays edited by David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister.

"I read that book with much excitement, because it hit an identity nerve with me," said Studin, the son of Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union who arrived in Canada three decades ago by way of Italy.

Inspired by What is a Jew?, Studin decided it might be useful to transpose Ben-Gurion's question to Canada, convinced it could be critical to an understanding of Canada's future.

Five years on, Studin– a Rhodes scholar, a former professional soccer player and now a federal civil servant based in Ottawa – has edited What is a Canadian?, a book published recently by McClelland & Stewart.

Consisting of 43 essays by English and French Canadians, Studin's volume is essentially a primer about this diverse and complex nation.

Studin, 30, asked each contributor to begin his or her essay with the words, "A Canadian is…" The results are thought-provoking, edifying and indicative of how some rather high-profile Canadians regard this country at the dawn of a new century.

> 'A Canadian is a political creature'

Paul Heinbecker, Canada's former ambassador to the United Nations, defines a Canadian as "a bearer of hope in troubled times."

Roy MacGregor, a newspaper columnist, describes a Canadian as "32,146,547 different things altogether."

Hugh Segal, a member of the Senate, calls a Canadian "the most fortunate, demanding and indebted person in the world."

Margaret MacMillan, a University of Toronto historian, observes that a Canadian is "someone who makes statements sound like questions."

Studin, who was born in Rome and raised in Toronto, has always been intrigued by that perennial observation.

"It was continuously posed during my childhood in family discussions, among friends and at school," said Studin, who is fluent in four languages.

"But the answers I received while growing up were rarely direct and, therefore, not satisfactory. They usually segued into into simplified discussions about Canada, or things typically considered Canadian, like hockey or cold weather."

To Studin, a Canadian is more than someone who's a fan of the Toronto Maple Leafs or likes Winnipeg in the dead of winter. A Canadian, he claims, is "a political creature" whose identity is formed on the anvil of politics.

He added, "A Canadian needs to constantly be cognizant that Canadians only exist within the context of the political system that defines them."

Studin embarked on his project without the benefit of a literary agent.

"I cold called Douglas Gibson, the publisher of McClelland & Stewart, and we talked about the book's possibilities."

A year later, having persuaded 30 Canadians from NDP-turned-Liberal politician Bob Rae to novelist Aritha van Herk to cooperate, Studin signed a contract with Gibson.

He chose the contributors – he calls them "sages" – on the basis of their writing ability and regional, gender, ethnic, linguistic and professional representativeness.

"I wanted brutal honesty, which required me to avoid elected officials, but a number of former and eventual politicians did ultimately contribute."

Listed by Maclean's magazine in 2000 as one of "100 young Canadians to watch," Studin is indeed a Canadian success story.

His parents, Yuri and Sima, who both own gymnastic centres, left Odessa in the mid-1970s.

Irvin Studin

"My father was especially keen on leaving, as his command of English and his reading of western literature had convinced him that life was better on the other side of the Iron Curtain. But anti-Semitism was also certainly a consideration."

The eldest of three children, he graduated from Aurora High School. His sisters, Rebecca and Sophia, are, respectively, law and dance arts students at Osgoode Hall and George Brown College.

At York University, where he specialized in economics and finance at the Schulich School of Business, Studin was a model student and the captain of the varsity soccer team.

In 1997, in his second year at university, he turned professional, playing with the Toronto Lynx club.

"I learned, however, that pro soccer, over the long term, was not for me."

Studin, who was also a member of Canada's Maccabiah soccer squad, won a coveted Rhodes scholarship – the fifth York University student to be so honoured – to further his studies in Britain.

He took philosophy, politics and economics at Oxford University and studied international relations at the London School of Economics.

After finishing his studies in 2002, he was hired as an analyst and policy advisor by the Privy Council Office in Ottawa.

"I quickly found myself working for the clerk of the Privy Council on Canadian positioning on the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. These were complicated cases in foreign policy. Canada's decision had to weigh, among other things, our direct interests in Iraq and the Middle East, our independent assessment of the threat to Canada and our allies posed by Iraq, our relationship with the United States, international law and national unity."

As well, Studin wrote many of the papers related to Canada's first-ever comprehensive review on national security policy and contributed to two throne speeches and two prime ministerial transitions.

In addition, he was seconded to Australia's equivalent of the Privy Council, the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, where he dispensed advice on foreign policy and national security issues.

He lived in Australia with his wife, Alla, an elementary school teacher and a former provincial champion in rhythmic gymnastics who came to Canada from Moldova in 1990 at age 11 and who is scheduled to give birth to their first child any day now.

"She used to work, ironically, in my mother's gymnastics club as a coach."

Studin's long-range goal is to join an international public policy organization dedicated to addressing the extremes of globalization and market forces, but for now, as his book suggests, he is firmly focused on Canada.

Carter's book still rankles despite apology and defence

By PENNY SCHWARTZ
JTA

WALTHAM, Mass. — Jimmy Carter's long-awaited speech at Brandeis University last week did little to assuage many of the critics angered by the former president's controversial book that blames Israel for the lack of Middle East peace.

In response to a question criticizing a section of his book that appears to justify the Palestinians' use of terrorism, Carter admitted it was a mistake.

Calling the wording "stupid," he said, "I apologize to you personally and to everyone here." Carter said he has asked his publishers to change the wording in future editions.

"Repeatedly I call on all to terminate the use of violence," he said.

Still, Carter largely defended both the book and the title, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, before a crowd of some 1,700.

Carter said he was accustomed to being stigmatized in political campaigns, but confessed that he had been stung by some of the recent criticism.

His visit to Brandeis, whose student population is about 50 per cent Jewish, was considered historic for the university. It was the first visit by a former president since Harry Truman delivered the commencement address 50 years ago, school spokesperson Dennis Nealon said.

Carter was invited to Brandeis by a group of faculty and students who earlier had petitioned university president, Jehuda Reinharz, to invite Carter. But Carter turned down an invitation to debate Alan Dershowitz, the Harvard University law professor who has authored several books on Israel and has been a vocal critic of Carter's book.

Dershowitz took the stage after Carter left the premises, in accordance with an agreement worked out with the university.

Dershowitz commended Carter for using the occasion to clarify his perspective, and to state his commitment to Israel.

"If Carter had written a book more like his comments, I do not believe there would have been so much controversy," Dershowitz quipped in his one-hour rebuttal. But he implied that Carter tailored his remarks to fit the audience.

The excitement among students on campus was palpable. About 50 demonstrators stood across from the centre, a mixture of pro-Palestinian groups from outside the campus and a smaller number of pro-Israel activists who handed out flyers citing inaccuracies in Carter's book.

Nicholas Brown, an undergraduate from Newton, Mass., had the good fortune to snag a front-row, centre seat in the large gym.

"To me, a former president, you don't pass up an opportunity to see him," Brown told JTA minutes before Carter's talk. "A lot of people are forming opinions without knowing what Carter says in his book. I think he's advocating for both sides."

Carter's book has drawn harsh criticism from scholars and former colleagues, including Emory University professor Kenneth Stein, a former executive director of the Carter Center. Stein resigned his position as a fellow at the centre in December to protest the book. A group of 14 Jewish members of the centre's board of councillors later resigned as well.

Dershowitz, Stein and others argue that Carter has become an advocate for the Palestinians rather than a broker for peace. They say he presents an oversimplified vision of how to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, placing most of the blame on Israel and ignoring years of killing and ongoing Palestinian terrorist attacks.

Steve Berman, an Atlanta real-estate developer who was among the 14 Carter Center board members to resign, told JTA after the speech, "The president is still not sending a clear and consistent stand on terror and the use of terror in the conflict."

"He's still saying one thing in the Arab media and another thing in the public arena here in America," Berman said.

But Rabbi Harry Danziger, president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, a Reform umbrella group, said he believed Carter was sincere in softening his position and wasn't pandering to a Jewish audience. Still, he said it was too early to tell if the CCAR would reverse its decision not to visit the Carter Center during the group's upcoming conference in Atlanta.

Carter spoke proudly of his efforts, in the late 1970s, to dramatically increase the number of Soviet Jewish émigrés, of creating the U.S. Holocaust Museum and of negotiating the 1978 Camp David accords, which led to a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt.

"I left office thinking Israel would soon realize peace with its neighbours," he said.

Carter said his book does not give aid or comfort to those who seek to denigrate Zionism as racism.

He acknowledged that the use of the word "apartheid" in the title was disturbing to the Jewish community.

"I chose that title knowing that it would be provocative, but in the long run it has precipitated discussion and there has been a lot of positive discussion," he said.

Among students, reaction to Carter's speech was mixed.

"I was particularly impressed with his apology," said Sarah Mulhern, a junior from Salt Lake City. "It came across as absolutely genuine."

But Ido Givon, a student from Israel and former soldier, criticized the former president.

"Throughout his lecture he was really biased, taking just one side of the conflict," Givon said. "I would like him to express his knowledge that Israelis are a victim in this story as well."

Larry Steinberg, executive director of the Brandeis Hillel, also found the presentation problematic.

While some of Carter's criticisms of Israeli policy are justified, Steinberg said, the book doesn't explain other factors beyond Israeli settlements that have hindered peace and barely acknowledges any Palestinian culpability.

"You would never know from reading the book that what was offered by the Israelis was 97 per cent of the West Bank," he said, referring to peace talks that broke down in 2000.

David Kuperstein, a student who helped bring Dershowitz to campus, said Carter's conciliatory talk did not reflect the vehement anti-Israel criticism of his book, perhaps giving listeners a false impression of moderation.

"The speech was middle of the road and not controversial, and therefore seemed to be accepted by the audience. They believed that this is what is written in the book," he said. "I would encourage people not to judge what is in the book by what he said."

Stolen gold medal returned to Paralympian

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Paul Rosen thinks back at the highlights of his life in sports, there's one memory that stands head and shoulders above the rest.

That was the night in Turin, Italy, when he backstopped Team Canada to a gold medal in the Paralympics sledge hockey tournament.

Rosen was outstanding in the final period of the gold-medal game as number 1-ranked Norway applied pressure, hoping to fight back from Canada's 2-0 lead. Instead, Canada held on, scored a late goal and Team Canada's Paralympians joined the women's team and the juniors as world champions in 2006.

Unlike other athletes who frame the medal and view it privately, Rosen displays his gold medal at numerous charity events. But in an incident that attracted widespread media attention, Rosen's gold medal was stolen on Jan. 13 at a fundraiser on behalf of Shoot for a Cure, a charity that supports spinal-cord research in Toronto.

"At first I thought someone was joking around," Rosen said. When he realized it was no prank, he said at first he felt "upset, then shock set in."

News of the purloined medal was broadcast that night on Hockey Night in Canada when Don Cherry, characteristically wearing his emotions on his tailored sleeve, urged the thief to return the medal by dropping it in a mailbox. Less than a week later, the medal turned up at a Toronto mail-sorting station. Police were called and the medal returned to its relieved owner.

Rosen believes Cherry deserves credit for convincing the thief to come clean, and in the wake of the incident, he has been flooded with media requests to describe what happened.

Despite the temporary loss of the medal, Rosen hasn't decided to lock it away. "The gold medal to me is Canada's gold medal," he explained. "I happen to take it home at night."

Rosen continues to take it with him when he addresses teams and corporate clients.

Although hockey is his passion, by profession he is a motivational speaker and he spends a lot of his time talking about the lessons he's learned in life.

"It's the story of how I lost my leg and became the person I am today," he said. His message is that "you can do anything you want to, if you put your mind to it."

Paul Rosen

It's an attitude he's always had, even before he lost his leg. "I always tried to do and play anything as hard as I could," he said.

Rosen, 46, was a Midget AAA player in a tournament in 1975 when his skate was caught in a rut and he fell, snapping his leg in 14 places. After numerous surgeries, in 1999 doctors discovered a massive infection and advised him if his leg was not amputated, he would not survive more than a few months.

At age 39, his right leg was amputated above the knee.

Rosen said triple amputee Shane Smith – who is also Jewish – inspired him to continue leading a productive life and not let his disability deter him. He met Smith, then 12, at Variety Village and struck up a friendship. Smith, who lost both legs and part of his arm to meningitis as a two-year-old, plays wheelchair basketball.

"He got me into sledge hockey," Rosen said. "It was very easy for me. All I had to do was get used to the sled."

Rosen took to goaltending like a natural, even though as a Midget he played forward. But, he was also a baseball catcher, so he came to the goalie position with a good glove hand and experience covering the plate. Those were skills that transferred nicely to sledge hockey.

To prepare himself for the Paralympic tournament, Rosen worked out for six months with able-bodied players – guys who played minor professional hockey and who shoot the puck hard. Stopping their 90-mph bullets prepared him nicely for the shooters in the Paralympic event, who only shoot the puck in the 70s. Despite his age – most of the squad is in the 17 to 24 range and Rosen's daughter is older than nine of his teammates – he was ready for the competition.

Even before the Paralympics, he had registered numerous successes. Winner of the prestigious 2005 Dan Snyder Memorial Award, he also backstopped Canada to a World Cup Silver Medal in 2005 as well as golds at the 2003 and 2004 World Championships. In 2000, he served as general manager of the Israeli national team when it won gold at an International Ice Hockey Federation Pool D event in Iceland.

Hockey Canada has included sledge hockey in its Circle of Excellence program, and Rosen says the sport is expected to grow by leaps and bounds – aided no doubt by his story and by Cherry's advocacy on his behalf.

Rosen plans to close out his international career at the 2010 Paralympics in Vancouver, hopefully with another gold, he said.

As for his other career, he plans to continue as a motivational speaker and hopes to expand his audience to include Jewish organizations.

"Disabled is just a mindset," he said. "I'm abled with only one leg. I do more with one leg than others do with two."

Canada to host Israel in Fed Cup

KAMLOOPS — Tennis Canada has announced that Kamloops Sport and Wellness Centre in Kamloops, B.C. will host the upcoming Fed Cup by BNP Paribas. Canada will face Israel on April 21 and 22 in the World Group II on indoor courts. The event will mark the first Fed Cup contest in Kamloops and third time in B.C. (after Vancouver in 1987 and 1996).

Canada defeated Israel in Fed Cup play in 1972 at Ellis Park in Johannesburg, South Africa.

Canada advanced to the World Group II following its 3-2 victory over Argentina in Edmonton in July. The Canadian team of Aleksandra Wozniak, Stéphanie Dubois, Marie-Ève Pelletier and Sharon Fichman finished 2006 with an all-time best ranking of 10th in the International Tennis Federation.

Countries that are victorious in World Group II matchups will advance to the World Group I playoffs, while losing nations will compete to remain in the World Group II competitions for 2008.

Fed Cup by BNP Paribas is the largest annual international team competition in women's sport, with 89 nations entered in 2007.

The iPod is kosher

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

In my high school of 1,200 students, only six of us were Jewish. We looked out for each other and even had a little gang – it was called the student council. And despite having this modest level of comfort and sway, I still recall with clarity the afternoons our history teacher would proclaim as casual fact that Jews were responsible for the death of Christ – information the class absorbed with startling ease.

Still, I can sincerely say it was a wonderful town to grow up in, and these memories of being an outsider have firmly thickened my skin – in no damaging, compassionless way, but enough for me to have empathy for those who are also outsiders.

The same feelings I had growing up Jewish in a small town, I experience now as a fan of Macintosh computers.

I put to you this: for me, the iPod is kosher – or kosher-style. In either case, the products of Apple Incorporated and the consumers of its genius, ergonomic devices suffer the same mild persecution, a strange "anti-Semitism," as I did in high school as a wandering son of Israel.

Since university, I have re-encountered this oddly familiar brand of social needling, reserved by and large for conflicts of race and colour. As a Mac enthusiast, I have been teased, questioned and handled. The cult-like segregation between PC and Mac is younger than Scientology but treated as if it were more authentic.

In the early 1970s – when the dramas of Silicon Valley burgeoned – two rival giants made polar opposite plans to advance. The Intel-chip systems allowed for "open architecture," which let third-party technologists clone, manufacture and develop their computers and the endless line of tangling peripherals plugging into them. This created an onslaught of PC brands like HP, IBM, DELL and countless others whose compatibilities were subtle and slim. After 30 years of divergence, they're now plagued by a quarter of a million viruses and require carefully matched peripherals and software to work with the various parts from competitive vendors whose guts both comprise and compromise their systems.

Over at Apple, with proprietary interest, they chose to craft all products themselves.

Thirty years later, the PC, having priced itself into every home, dominates the market, celebrating corporate success beyond fiscal measure while frustrating its users greatly and squandering technological potential. Yet tinier Apple has remained true to its commitment to quality, has pioneered helpful user interfaces, marvelous hardware and reliability of its products, and has not prostrated the brand.

For these reasons, Macintosh computers are more reliable.

In industry, deadlines are often unyielding. I have relied often on Apple systems not only for their "ease of use," but also for the productivity and reliability they ensure.

Apple computers do not suffer the same syphilitic system failures that open architecture computers do, where any combination of conflicting software drivers for sound cards, a mouse or a camera could crash everything.

Has Mac lost valuable market share by concerning itself so exclusively with development and manufacture? Certainly, but in doing so, it has paralleled the persevering history of the Jewish people.

A few aggressive crusades of our own design could have expanded our presence, but ultimately, intermarriage and assimilation have diluted the workings of our ancient brand; whereas maintaining community ties and proprietary traditions have preserved our cultural integrity. Structurally, our plight is much like the history of my favourite desktop computer.

I acknowledge the attractive economical price point of the PC and its worldwide acceptance – but at what penalty? Be wary of popularity. Be prudent with your personal and technological choices. Test the products you are considering. Raise your children with a sense of community and tradition, and send them to summer camp – with iPods.

Anything less is self-loathing.

Jewish students rediscover activism

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

This year, I attended the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' annual convention, which was held in Kingston, Ont. from Jan. 18 to 21.

The conference was attended by Jewish university students from across Canada, including from schools in Vancouver, Kitchener-Waterloo and Prince Edward Island. Its purpose was to create an environment in which students could gather to network, strengthen their relationships to their communities and other campuses, and learn about crucial issues affecting the Jewish world.

The organizers did a superlative job co-ordinating the even, both in terms of form and content.

The four-day convention was very haimish (warm) and allowed participants to "hang their hat" for a few days in the comfort of Queen's University, Beth Israel Synagogue (the local shul) and a hotel overlooking Lake Ontario. Havdalah, held in Queen's biosciences building, was a boisterous affair led by guitar-playing participants who danced and sang with a circle of students.

The organizers clearly had a tidy budget to work with, a testimony to the commitment of the mainstream Jewish community's investment in Jewish students on campus and to the fortune of Canadian Jewry to live in a time of great affluence.

I wondered, however, about the benefit of paying $6,000 to speaker Craig Kielberger – the young founder of Free the Children, a Canadian lobby group that seeks to end child labour – to wrap up the event. I concluded that the larger Jewish organizations are in a financial position to ensure competitive educational and experiential programs for a certain segment of our youth. Going for the best, therefore, is sometimes prudent, as it raises the standard of our work and likely makes such conventions more attractive to hip, program-savvy students.

As for content, the lineup of speakers was excellent and included Toronto's very own Judy Feld Carr, a key figure in the rescue of Syrian Jewry. It's always an honour to be in the presence of this lovely Forest Hill bubbie, who spoke about her modern-day heroics in buying the freedom of one Jewish life after another from a cruel and despotic country.

Mostly, I felt very positive about the conference's tikkun olam (repairing the world) component. I was also fortunate to be able to facilitate a panel discussion on Saturday evening about activism on campus.

The three university students on the panel were Ben Fine, the founder of STAND (Students Taking Action Now for Darfur); Matt Godwin, the founder of SHOUT (Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance); and Mike Roskies, the founder of Africa Is Real, a student group that's building awareness about genocide and illness in Africa. All three were articulate and passionate about their missions and have successfully launched branches of their respective groups on dozens of campuses.

I believe that the last few decades have been the dark ages for university students in terms of social activism. As genocides were happening in Rwanda and Kosovo, most Jewish campus organizations remained silent, in contrast to the forceful responses we saw against the Vietnam war.

Today, however, we are beginning to see more enlightened Jewish students who are prepared to roll up their sleeves and get their hands dirty, to live up to the central Jewish imperative of loving thy neighbour and the promise of "never again."

I therefore commend the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students and student leaders who are determined to ensure that our university students are once again shaking up authority and working diligently to make campuses a bastion of activism and tikkun olam. Well done.

The convention, through its Jewish hospitality, choice of speakers and sessions, clearly lived up to its theme: "Own.iT."

It's winter, but they plant trees!

Hundreds of youths enrolled in the MASA (Journey) program in Israel – which enables post-secondary-age Israelis to volunteer in learning, social and other programs – took part in a Tu b'Shvat planting last week in the Nachshon Forest near Jerusalem. At the end of the day of digging and planting, they celebrated with a spectacular Tu b'Shvat feast. [Israel Sun photos]

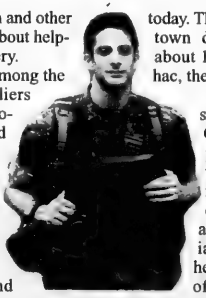
Canadian soldier helps restore abandoned Bosnian Jewish cemetery

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A derelict Jewish cemetery in Bosnia, a sad remnant of a community that almost disappeared in 1941, is being restored through the efforts of the local Muslim authorities and a Canadian Jewish soldier stationed there.

Lt. Gabriel Granatstein, 25, of Montreal, who has been serving with a peacekeeping mission since September, said in a telephone interview that a local municipal leader, Salko Rekanovic, a Muslim, approached Canadian and other international forces about helping fix up the cemetery.

As the only Jew among the 11 Canadian soldiers serving with the European Union Force-led mission, Granatstein took up the challenge. The contingent is based in Bihac in the Una-Sana canton, a mountainous northwest region that is 90 per cent Muslim and where no Jews live today. The cemetery is in the town of Jezero-Privilica, about 15 minutes from Bihac, the canton's main city.



Lt. Gabriel Granatstein

As a liaison and observation officer, Granatstein's job is to patrol and report back what he sees. He meets with civic and community leaders, as well as local Bosnian army units, and helps support the rule of law and rebuilding efforts.

As much as he wanted to help, Granatstein admits he was nervous at first about "advertising that I am Jewish and looking for a Jewish cemetery."

But his concerns proved to be unwarranted. He met Rekanovic, who told him he had been continually discussing the state of the burial ground with peacekeepers since 2002.

"It surprised me that a Muslim community leader could be so interested in a Jewish cemetery," Granatstein said.

Kolel Receives Grant

TORONTO — Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is one of 10 North American educational institutions, and the only one in Canada, to receive part of $1.4 million (US) in grants from Covenant Foundation, the New York-based foundation said last week. The Toronto organization is getting $110,000 over 2½ years for Project Open Book: the Kolel Digital Resource Library, which will make learning resources available online. Kolel also got a Covenant grant last year.

WORLD

Iranians Recall Shoah

NEW YORK — More than 100 Iranian scholars, writers and activists at home and abroad honoured Shoah victims and excoriated Iran's government for denying the Nazi genocide. A petition in the latest New York Review of Books calls the Shoah an "undeniable" historical fact, deplores Iran's use of Holocaust denial as "a propaganda tool" and says "the new brand of anti-Semitism" in the Mideast has no precedent in Iran's history. It also pays "homage to the memory of the millions of Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust."

U.K. Incidents Spike

LONDON — Anti-Semitic incidents in Britain are at their highest since record-keeping began in 1984, says a study by the Community Security Trust, which represents Jews on anti-Semitism, policing and security. There were 594 incidents in Britain in 2006, up 31 per cent from 2005. In 227 incidents, the victims were individuals; 79 incidents targeted events. Fifty involved Jews heading to or leaving shul. Jewish schools recorded 59 incidents, including 25 against children during their commute. During last summer's Israel-Hezbollah, war, there were 134 incidents. Thirteen people were convicted of offences relating to incidents in 2005 and 2006. Other 2006 cases are awaiting trial.

Attacks Rose in 2006

JERUSALEM — Anti-Semitic attacks rose in 2006, especially in Europe, an Israeli study found. The severity of the violence intensified in some cases, according to the study released last week by the Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism. There were hundreds of violent attacks ranging from murder to bodily injury, property damage and threats, according to the report sponsored by Israel, the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization. In Austria, incidents jumped 66 per cent, in Germany 60 per cent and in Scandinavia 50 per cent. Ukraine and Britain reported a small decrease. The study said Holocaust denial and Israel's war with Hezbollah seemed to account for the rise.

Looted Art Returned

LONDON — A London art institute will return two Old Master drawings to the heirs of a Czech victim of the Nazis. A U.K. government committee on Nazi-looted art claims ruled Jan. 25 on three works that once belonged to Arthur Feldmann, a Czech lawyer whom the Nazis tortured to death in 1941. The drawings to be returned by the Courtauld Institute of Art, valued at up to $23,519 (US), are by 17th-century painters Giuseppe Bibiena and Carl Ruthart. As an act of goodwill, the heirs gave the third work to the institute. It didn't contest the claim and said it didn't know the works' origins when it received them in a 1952 bequest.

Halimi To Be Reburied

PARIS — The body of a French Jew who was kidnapped and tortured to death in early 2006 by a youth gang seeking ransom will be reburied in Jerusalem's Givat Shaul cemetery Feb. 9. French Jews believe Ilan Halimi was targeted for being Jewish, but some people in France say officials only called it an anti-Semitic crime to placate Jewish leaders. The gang members, who are awaiting trial, reportedly admitted they hate Jews and kidnapped Halimi because they thought all Jews are rich.

Rabbi Accosted

BRATISLAVA — Three men verbally accosted Slovakia's chief rabbi, Rabbi Baruch Meyers, and his son, 12, as they were leaving Bratislava's only shul Jan. 27. The men – who yelled, "Jews to the oven," "Sieg Heil" and "Jews out" – were in their late 20s and "were very aggressive and I was worried they would attack us," the rabbi said. He and his son ran away. Police arrested two men and said they'd be charged with expressing sympathy with a movement that denies human rights. They could face up to three years in jail. The rabbi was assaulted by skinheads in 1993 and 1995, but said such incidents are rare in Slovakia.

Statement Mistakenly Attributed to Mayor

JERUSALEM — The Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism said last week that it mistakenly attributed a statement comparing Israelis to Nazis to the mayor of Montreal.

The forum, a partnership of the government of Israel, the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization, held a press conference earlier in the week to present data on anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial around the world.

One of the forum's spokespeople referred to a statement last August by Stephane Gendron, the mayor of Huntingdon, Que., to a Quebec City daily in which Gendron described Israelis as "modern-day Nazis." The spokesperson mistakenly said Gendron is the mayor of Montreal.

A data sheet in Hebrew also misidentified Gendron, and the mistake appeared in the English edition of Ha'aretz. The paper issued an apology.

Gérald Tremblay is the mayor of Montreal.

Ethnic groups unite on issue of war criminals

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Frustration with Canada's lack of action in dealing with aging war criminals living in this country brought together representatives from several ethnic communities last week to press the federal government to have them deported.

Canadian Jewish Congress was joined Jan. 30 in Ottawa by members of the Armenian, Roma and Rwandan communities, representing peoples who have been the victims of genocide, in calling on the federal government to act before "time and natural death" renders action impossible. (The Darfur Association of Canada also signed off on the effort, but its representative was unable to attend the joint press conference).

Meeting reporters three days after International Holocaust Remembrance Day, established by the United Nations General Assembly in 2006 as Jan. 27 (the anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp), the groups decried the fact that genocide is still happening around the world, and they noted that Canada continues to be a safe haven for people who have committed crimes against humanity.

In their various remarks, they highlighted the cases of six suspected war criminals who are still living in Canada despite being found to have acted as Nazi enablers by Canadian courts.

Helmut Oberlander, Vladimir Katriuk, Wasyl Odynsky, Jacob Fast, Jura Skomatchuk and Josef Furman – whose alleged activities range from being an SS guard to involvement with an elite killing unit – all allegedly entered Canada by lying about their wartime pasts.

"It is long past time for them to be removed from this country," said Ian Sadinsky of the communications and community relations committee of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa. "Canada's failure to do even this small action is an insult not only to the victims of Nazism, but also to the many other communities who have known the terror of homicidal hatred.

"Canada should offer no haven for the enablers of genocide. Killing machines depend not only on the hands that guide them, but also on the cogs that move and mesh and yield death as their product."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said that "only a handful of Nazi enablers remain in this country. These are individuals like the collaborators Vladimir Katriuk and Jacob Fast or the labour camp guards Wasyl Odynsky, Josef Furman and Jura Skomatchuk. They are the men without whom the Nazis could not have done their bloody work.

"And when they came to Canada to start new lives, they lied about their wartime activities in order to gain the precious privilege of Canadian citizenship."

Farber said that the "need for urgency on the part of the government of Canada is nowhere clearer than in the case of Helmut Oberlander. Here you have an individual who was a translator for a mobile killing unit responsible for the murder of thousands of Jews. He has lived in this country for more than 50 years. His continued residency in Canada is shameful."

Oberlander's case, as well as those of the other five, "require only political will to be resolved," said Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies. "They dishonour the privilege of Canadian citizenship."

Jean-Paul Nyilinkwaya, a spokesperson for PAGE-Rwanda, said, "We are also here because we have a debt of gratitude towards the Canadian Jewish Congress and other advocacy groups, because they started this battle for justice before the genocide happened in Rwanda. It is because of their groundbreaking work that when we first began noticing the presence [in Canada] of Rwandans suspected to be genocide perpetrators around 1996, that there was a war crimes unit at the RCMP to receive our complaints."

Aris Babikian, executive director of the Armenian National Committee of Canada, said that "Armenians all over the world believe in accountability and responsibility. The punishment of the guilty is imperative, because it will help the civil society of the perpetrator to atone for the crimes of its leaders and to reconcile with the victim nation. As we have seen, without recognition of the crime and punishment of the guilty, there can be no reconciliation."

Adler added that it's "time for Canada to send those who lied about their roles with the Nazis back to where they belong."

Miloslav Slavchev spoke on behalf of the Roma Community Centre. Also in attendance was Liberal MP Susan Kadis.

Restoring the Hurva

From the editor's desk

It is very likely that Jerusalem's past has been studied more closely than that of any other city on Earth – especially during the past 40 years after the eastern (Old) part of the city and the western (New) part were reunited in the Six Day War.

Archeologists are constantly digging through the city's layered history to uncover more pieces of its timeless, metaphysical mosaic.

And yet, sad to say, among a great many people, the city's recent past is less known than its ancient past. Thus, for example, they accept Old Jerusalem as being Arab Jerusalem in full defiance of recent history and simple truth that until 1948 Jews had lived there in large, cramped numbers.

Indeed, in 1896, some 28,000 of the city's 45,000 inhabitants were Jews. By then, Jewish life had already spilled over the walls of the Old City westward across the Hinnom Valley near Moses' Montefiore's windmill and near the Damascus Gate along the Jaffa highway.

The Jewish Quarter of the Old City was alive with Jewish life, but it came to an abrupt, sorrowful end with the armistice that ended the fighting in Israel's War of Independence in 1949.

In violation of every civilized nation's practice granting freedom of worship and freedom of access to holy places, Jews were no longer allowed to live in the Old City. They were expelled from their homes by the Jordanian army and permanently prevented from praying at the Western Wall or at their synagogues.

And worse.

In a mocking replication of the Romans' malicious destruction of Jewish Jerusalem some 1,900 years earlier, the Jordanian regime systematically destroyed all the vestiges of Jewish life that had so long dominated the Old City of Jerusalem.

Thus, Jewish tombstones from the Mount of Olives were used for paving roads and latrines. And every synagogue in the Old City was demolished.

After the Jordanians stopped destroying Jewish markers in the Old City, the defining symbol of the Jewish life that had once thrived there was the Jerusalem-stone arch that had supported the cupola of the neo-Byzantine-style Hurva synagogue, which had once been the largest, most important Ashkenazi synagogue in all of Israel. Its name meant, literally, "the ruins," because it had been built in 1867 on the ruins of a synagogue that had existed on that very same spot two centuries earlier.

The name was also to be a melancholy precursor, alas, to its own destruction at the hands of the Jordanians in 1948-49.

Now the reconstruction of the Hurva Synagogue is under way. The symbol of Jewish life in Jerusalem and the embodiment of the interminable connection between Jews and the Old City is rising once again.

The Jerusalem Foundation, through whose auspices The CJN recently visited Jerusalem, is spearheading the drive to acquire the remaining necessary funds, some $2,750,000 (US), to enable the Hurva to be rebuilt.

The plans of the foundation are to ensure that "the synagogue will be a reproduction of the original building. It will feature a central rotunda seating 230 people, at the heart of which will stand the bimah." It will contain many auxiliary rooms and rise to five floors and is expected "to retake its position as one of the city's spiritual and esthetic landmarks."

We walked to the synagogue on a warm, honey-gold day in late January. Our guide was a knowledgeable, energetic, young Israeli, Tamar Gruenewald, who led us from the storied guest house of Mishkenot Sha'ananim across the valley through the winding alleys and along the high ramparts of the Old City to the site of the Hurva reconstruction.

We walked neither directly nor quickly to the Hurva. We stopped when Tamar wished to impart insight and explanation about the significance of a particular spot where she noticed antiquity and modernity had intersected. This meant, of course, that we stopped frequently, the sun warming our backs. The high blue sky was a perfect Hollywood backdrop to the ubiquitous beige, cream and faint brown of the heavy stones that seemed to grow from the dusty hills.

Our walk was a discovery of place and of self that exhilarated the soul even as it wearied the body. As we walked, we were digging through fallen pieces of our own lives for a sense of our future.

The archeologists of Jerusalem were digging to the south and to the west of the Old City for a sense of the city's past, reimagining and reconstructing through slow, painstaking labour the ancient place that never once through thousands of years lost its claim upon the souls and the aspirations of the people who will soon again be able to worship in the Hurva Synagogue.

Paper Clip Project creator discusses power of one

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Linda Hooper, the woman who started the Paper Clip Project, was in Toronto last week to promote a message about tolerance and the "power of one."

Hooper, an educator for 30 years and the principal of Whitwell Middle School in Whitwell, Tenn., was invited by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO to be the guest speaker at the WIZO services campaign, which raises money for schools, women's shelters and health care centres.

Hooper spoke to a sold-out crowd last week at York University about "The Power of One," following a fundraising silent auction and a screening of the film Paper Clips.

Paper Clips, an award-winning documentary filmed in 2004, was based on a campaign initiated in 1998 by Hooper to have her students collect one paper clip for each of the six million Jewish Holocaust victims to help the children better understand the extent of the genocide.

Linda Hooper

Hooper said she wanted to expose the students to a part of history that they had no real connection to.

"The biggest thing that inspired me is that our children lead really sheltered lives. We live in a very quiet, a very Protestant community," she said, adding that Whitwell is a community of only 1,600.

"There aren't any Jewish families in our area, and I just want our children to have a sense of a global perspective," Hooper said. "I thought the Holocaust would bring something totally foreign to them. It would bring them the overwhelming effect, but also bring them in contact with a whole new culture. Our children have never talked to Jewish people before, and I just thought it would be something that would be a great experience for them, and it has been."

'I just want our children to have a sense of a global perspective'

This wasn't the first time Hooper has been involved with members of the Toronto Jewish community.

Last May, about 350 Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance (JMA) members from Canada, the United States and Australia, including 70 from Toronto, rode to Whitwell to honour the staff and students responsible for the Paper Clip Project.

Steven Stein, president of Toronto-based Yidden On Wheels, helped raise enough money to purchase eight Promethean boards, electronic teaching aids that cost $4,000 each, for the school.

"They were so great. You should hear my teachers. They're always asking, when can we get those motorcyclists to come back?" Hooper said.

She said the entire community has been instilled with a sense of pride because of the Paper Clip Project.

"Our community has such pride in this project and the students do, too. And it has really increased the sensitivity of the students who are participating in it, because they get the opportunity to talk to survivors and have the opportunity to talk to people who are from somewhere else in the world."

She said that learning about the Holocaust has also made them more aware of other atrocities around the world.

"Last year, they participated in the million postcard campaign trying to encourage our president [George W. Bush] to do something about Darfur. This year, they are raising money for various causes, one of them being for orphanages in South Africa," Hooper said, adding that there are more than 100,000 children in South Africa who have been orphans because of AIDS.

During her speech at the WIZO services campaign, the message she hoped to convey is that people need to talk less and act more.

"I think we all need to recognize that we are all powerful and everything starts with one. A word, an action a deed, whatever. Everything in this world starts with one and it is your responsibility to look around and see what you need to do."

Local Conservative rabbis, Americans differ on gay issue

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A survey released last week by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) revealed dramatic differences in the attitudes of Canadian and American leaders of the Conservative movement regarding rabbinic ordination of gays and lesbians.

Of the Canadian rabbis and cantors who took part in the survey, 82 per cent were opposed to gay rabbis.

However, 69 per cent of the American rabbis and cantors who took part in the survey were in favour of the idea, with 25 per cent opposed, and the survey showed a consistent majority of support for gay rabbis as well as same-sex commitment ceremonies among the 5,583 respondents.

The 919 rabbis who took part in the survey represent 63 per cent of those on the Rabbinical Assembly's e-mail list. Twenty-five of them are from Canada, drawn from a total of more than 30 here who are part of the Rabbinical Assembly.

Among Israeli clergy, 45 per cent opposed gay ordination, the same number that supported it. Support was generally higher among women, less observant respondents, and younger people, with the exception of JTS students, of whom only 58 per cent were in favour (with 28 per cent opposed).

Last December, the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards endorsed three conflicting opinions on homosexuality, one of which allows commitment ceremonies for same-sex couples, as well as the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis. Two other opinions, which would have removed all restrictions on gay activities, were declared takanot, or substantial breaks from tradition that would require a majority of votes for adoption. They were defeated.

Despite the support expressed in the survey, 67 per cent of clerical leaders also responded that they were "somewhat embarrassed" by the tshuvot.

A decision on whether to admit openly gay students to the rabbinical school at JTS – the movement's flagship institution – is expected in the spring.

Arnold Eisen, JTS chancellor-elect, said the survey results are "one factor among many" that are being considered. The school and the movement pride themselves on their commitment to pluralism, he wrote in a letter on the JTS website.

Coincidentally, last week JTS also announced the appointment of Rabbi Daniel Nevins as the new dean of its rabbinical school. Rabbi Nevins, who co-authored the most liberal paper that was accepted, will take on the post July 1.

Rabbi Wayne Allen

The survey, for which invitations went out to 18,676 e-mail addresses, yielded a higher response rate than most other studies of the Jewish community and is likely "pretty accurate," Hebrew Union College sociologist Steven Cohen, who conducted the survey, told The CJN in a phone interview.

"There's always a chance that people on the extremes will be a little more motivated to respond... but the averages should be about right," Cohen said.

He said the more traditional views of rabbinical students likely relates to the phenomenon of "seminarians in any religion... getting in touch with their piety in its purest form.

"When they leave the seminary, they are confronted with the complexities and realities of the lives of their congregants, and their views become more complex."

Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue and also president of the Rabbinical Assembly's Ontario region, takes a strong stand against the potential changes in the movement.

"I am deeply concerned and profoundly saddened by what it represents," he said. "There appears to be the impression created that one can be traditional and committed to Halachah, and at the same time applaud all of the changes that do violence to Halachah... I understand fully why critics of the Conservative movement have called into question its authenticity."

Leaders of the Conservative movement continue to maintain that it is a halachic movement based on Jewish law, a perception borne out by the survey.

In a news release available on the JTS website, Cohen notes "four areas of strong consensus" in the Conservative movement. In addition to commitment to Halachah, he cites support for women as clergy, and opposition to both patrilineal descent (recognizing the child of a Jewish father and non-Jewish mother as Jewish) and rabbis officiating at interfaith marriages.

"The consensus around these issues speaks to the underlying unity and distinctiveness of the Conservative movement," Cohen said in the release.

A little more than a year ago, Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation proposed the idea of a "sovereignty association" for Canadian congregations within the Conservative movement.

Discussion on the topic – mostly focused in the Toronto area – is ongoing, said Rabbi Allen. "In due course, each congregation will be presented with a new proposal for organization [being developed by the synagogues], and if it's adopted by each congregation, if there is consensus among the congregations, then taking action might be discussed."

'Many of us are conflicted,' meeting hears

At a public meeting regarding the gay issue last Thursday night at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, rabbis Philip Scheim, of Beth David, and Baruch Frydman-Kohl, of Beth Tzedec Congregation, spoke about the decision of the committee on Jewish law and standards, of which they are voting members.

About 70 people attended the meeting, which was chaired by Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, and publicized by e-mail only the previous afternoon.

"Many of us are conflicted," said Rabbi Scheim, speaking for his traditionally minded counterparts. "We still feel a strong tie to the movement. We have allegiances to the institutions that trained us. Our colleagues, our friends – many are on the other side of this issue."

Four members of the law committee resigned over the December vote. "They felt this was a biblical prohibition that no amount of rabbinic interpretation could justify. Other people remained on the committee who were deeply opposed to the decision," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl at the meeting.

"Does this [issue] threaten the idea of pluralism? Yes," he said during the question-and-answer session. "More importantly, it pushes people more toward one pole.

"People start to ask where they belong," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. "The Conservative movement, if it wants to maintain the traditional elements, has to work very hard to say, 'There's a place for you. You have a legitimate voice.'"

Rabbi Scheim said he does not foresee "much of a fallout" in Canada, partly because each congregational rabbi is the mara d'atra (halachic decisor) for his own congregation, and also because gays and lesbians can have civil marriage ceremonies here.

"Rabbis will have a bit more pressure in places where [gays and lesbians can't have civil marriage ceremonies]," he said. He noted that he has received many more inquiries about interfaith ceremonies than about same-sex ones.

Traditional views do not mean that gays are unwelcome, the rabbis indicated. Similarly, Rabbi Scheim noted, intermarried couples are welcome at Conservative services although they cannot be married at the synagogue.

For many young people, the gay issue is "a litmus test of the relevancy of religion in their lives," Rabbi Allen said.

Dead Sea Scrolls opened new historical vistas: expert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1947, when Jews and Arabs in Palestine seemed on the brink of war, a Palestinian shepherd tending to his goats on the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea stumbled upon one of the most sensational archeological finds of modern times: the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The shepherd, having noticed that one of his goats had wandered into a cave at a desolate place known as Khirbet Qumran, threw a rock inside in an attempt to lure the stray animal outside.

When he heard the sound of shattering pottery, he went in. There, to his amazement, he discovered a number of ancient jars, inside of which, wrapped in linen, were desiccated scrolls.

The discovery touched off a frantic scramble. Between 1947 and 1956, more scrolls, in 10 other caves in the vicinity, turned up.

Of immense historical and religious value, they are virtually the only surviving biblical documents produced before 100 CE.

"The significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls lies in the fact that, for the first time, we have in hand original written materials from 2,000 years ago that shed light on the society, history, literature and practices of Jews in the Land of Israel," Adolfo Roitman said in an interview last week.

Roitman, who was in Toronto on Feb. 3 to deliver a lecture on the scrolls, is the director and curator of the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, which houses Israel's collection of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

An ordained rabbi who holds a PhD in ancient Jewish literature and religion from Hebrew University, he explained that the scrolls, consisting of some 950 manuscripts, offer an unrivalled picture of ancient Jewish society and its pluralistic structure.

"The scrolls enable us to understand the transformation of Jewish society from biblical Israel to Rabbinic Judaism, filling in gaps of knowledge we had before their discovery," he noted.

The Shrine of the Book has eight major scrolls – the Great Isaiah Scroll, the Isaiah Scroll, the War Scroll, the Genesis Apocryphon, the Community Rule, the Temple Scroll, the Thanksgiving Scroll and the Commentary on Habakkuk.

"All the other scrolls are in the possession of the Israel Antiquities Authority," added Roitman.

In addition, a few fragments are displayed at the Bibliothéque National in Paris, or are privately owned.

The readable material was deciphered and then published by Oxford University Press in a series of books titled Discoveries in the Judean Desert.

Roitman said that the most of the scrolls were originally found in fragments and that only a handful were in acceptable condition.

But today, thanks to techniques pioneered by the Israel Antiquities Authority, the scrolls look fine.

At the Israel Museum, the scrolls are housed in specially built rooms in which the temperature and humidity are strictly controlled by computerized systems.

Roitman, a native of Argentina who immigrated to Israel in 1980, lectures widely on the scrolls and has written several books about them.

In 1997, to mark the 50th anniversary of their discovery, he mounted A Day at Qumran, an exhibition that explored the daily life and rituals of the Essenes, the sect believed to have copied and stored the scrolls.

More recently, in collaboration with the Canadian Museum of Civilization and the Montreal Museum of Archeology and History, he produced an exhibition titled Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Fundraiser planned for adults with special needs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kathy Laszlo and Susie Sokol are part of what they call "a new generation" of parents who are advocates for their special needs children, now young adults.

Last year, the two Thornhill women created an organization called DANI – an acronym for "Developing and Nurturing Independence."

On March 25, the group, which ran a one-week day camp last summer, will hold a gala dinner that the women hope will raise $100,000. They plan to use the funds to kick-start a vocational/social/academic program for young adults with special needs, including cognitive and mobility issues.

Current programs, they say, have very long waiting lists, are across town, lack training for participants and/or are disconnected from the Jewish community.

The dinner will honour Rabbi Joseph Kelman, co-founder of Reena; Carol Goldman, principal of Zareinu Educational Centre; Dr. Gerald Friedman, chief of pediatrics at York Central Hospital; and Estée Klar-Wolfond, founder of the Autism Acceptance Project.

To coincide with the dinner weekend, DANI, which has more than 50 families on its mailing list, contacted 102 Toronto-area rabbis to ask that March 24 be designated "Shabbat Kulanu" ("a Shabbat for all of us"). They have requested that each synagogue plan a Shabbat activity that would be open to special needs children and young adults.

They are hoping it will raise awareness in the larger Jewish community, said Laszlo, an accountant, social worker, and mother of three whose son Danny is 20 and has special needs.

Also, said Sokol – a community college instructor and single mother of five whose 22-year-old daughter, Talya, attends a day program – some parents are hesitant to take their special needs children to synagogue if they are "vocal" or find it hard to sit through services. "If they see a synagogue that's welcoming, it makes a huge difference."

The first phase of Laszlo and Sokol's dream is a kosher café, based on a model in the South African Jewish community, that will provide employment for their children, as well as educational opportunities, and recreational and social activities. It would span a full day from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

They hope to open it this fall in Thornhill, said Laszlo. The café would be staff-run, but would involve volunteers from the wider community.

She also mentioned the possibility of selling hostess gift baskets, to teach participants business skills.

Participants would work shifts, either in the front with customers, or in back. "We are not going to try to change these young adults to make them the kind of people who can work in a certain environment," said Laszlo. "We are going to change the environment so they can work."

As an example, she noted that the menu would be designed so that the customers could mark their food choices, because not all people with special needs can read and write. It is a way of preserving their dignity, she explained. Customers "will never know" whether or not their servers are literate.

She noted that some people with special needs can perform certain tasks "even better" than those without. "Most people don't like repetitive work because it's boring, but for some of them, it's exactly what they need," she said.

She envisions participants going out to work in the community as well as doing jobs in the restaurant – perhaps on tasks such as stuffing envelopes – and being driven by volunteers.

"As much as it's for our kids, this is a unifying project for Jews in Toronto," said Laszlo, noting the cross-denominational aspect of the project.

The current generation of young adults with special needs has been integrated into camps and schools, unlike earlier generations, said Sokol. "They made all these connections to the community, the neighbourhood, when they were young. This is a natural progression."

"What happens if they have nothing or very little in terms of stimulation, they start to regress," said Laszlo. "As we parents start to age, we have less energy. It makes us realize that something must be done while we are still around."

In the future, once the restaurant is established, the two women are looking to open a group home, possibly based on a model like Montreal's Maison Shalom, also started by parents.

Baycrest pioneers caring for aging survivors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In order to deal with the special needs of elderly Holocaust survivors, Baycrest, with support from the Claims Conference, has developed a Holocaust Resource Project.

The aim of the project, which includes a 250-page practice manual titled Caring for Aging Holocaust Survivors, edited by social worker Paula David and research assistant Sandi Pelly, is to develop models of care, education and outreach that promote optimum care for aging Holocaust survivors.

David, a graduate of the University of Toronto and a social worker at Baycrest for 20 years, says the project is a work in process, because "15 years ago there were no elderly survivors. Everything we do is a first-time experience."

They have shared their ongoing research with agencies that deal with seniors, such as Circle of Care and Jewish Family & Child Service, and nursing homes that cater to Jewish families.

"We have also worked with other communities that work with aging war survivors, because some of the impact of the trauma is the same," says David.

"We've worked with the Chinese, Italian and Rwandan communities, and we've also worked with [Veteran Affairs Canada] because the similarity of some needs between Holocaust survivors and veterans is remarkable."

A report published by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto states that Toronto has the largest population of Holocaust survivors in Canada, she says, "and a high percentage of them are at Baycrest. We started our work initially because we wanted to learn how to serve them better."

The manual is directed to Baycrest's entire staff, says David, from nurses to office workers to kitchen help, and includes a historical overview of the Holocaust, immigrant and settlement experience, grief and the Holocaust survivor, environmental factors and potential trauma triggers.

Also included are some tips from adult children who are caring for their survivor parents. "Six years ago, we started a group for children of survivors, and it is still going strong. No one is thrilled about their parents becoming frail and elderly, but it is different for survivors' children. The bond between the group members has become strong."

'The challenge is to find out what works best for each person'

Aging is a new phenomenon for many survivors, she says, because they come from a world where the elders and the sick were often killed.

"Growing old is something new to them and to their kids, who [for the most part] did not have grandparents. They are all dealing with the same developmental stages at the same time. They need to learn about aging."

Most Holocaust survivors have nightmarish memories, "but those with dementia might think they're back in time. Certain words such as 'shower' or 'bath' might be a trigger for them, and they may be prone to hoarding food," David says.

"The challenge is to find out what works best for each person."

At Comfort Keepers, a company that provides professional caregiving services, staff recently attended an information session on understanding the needs of aging Holocaust survivors.

Laurie Saunders, co-owner of Comfort Keepers, says that Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service, spoke to staff about a number of issues revolving around survivors.

"Loud talking, barking dogs or the smell of an antiseptic can set off some people. Gaining insight into these triggers allows caregivers to be more sensitive to survivors' behaviour," she says.

At Baycrest, says David, a drop-in program called Café Europa has been set up to reach out to Holocaust survivors. Running every Friday morning, it features refreshments, music, discussion groups and guest speakers.

"Many survivors need a little support to relax, socialize and enjoy themselves. Now we have a venue for them."

While Baycrest expected about 30 or 40 people to attend each week, the cafe has had at least 100 people every week since starting in late November.

"They are reaching out to each other," says David whose research for her PhD thesis is focusing on this group.

Baycrest is also working on a Living Narratives Project, which records the life stories of survivors who live at Baycrest, and an intergenerational remembrance day project with students in York Region that emphasizes understanding and diversity between cultures, religions and ethnic groups.

Advice well heeded

The international commemoration last week of the liberation of Auschwitz some 62 years ago – as the day on which the world must reflect upon the unspeakable brutality and horror of the Holocaust – augers well for the abolition of genocide in all its hideous manifestations. Or so one would think.

Yet the people of Darfur appear no closer to a cessation of the persecution and slaughter at the hands of Janjaweed militiamen and their supporters in the government of Sudan.

And of course, despite the fact that his representative voted for the anti-Holocaust resolution on the floor of the United Nations General Assembly last week, Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad repeats at every opportunity that Israel must be wiped off the map and refuses to abandon his pursuit of nuclear weapons capability.

The smooth-sounding speeches at the United Nations therefore, while welcome in their substance and hopeful for the possibilities they could portend for the future, should not yet give solace to those of us worried about Iran's intentions. Ahmadinejad is a dangerous man who finds his strength in dangerous eschatological beliefs.

Our ongoing concern is thus legitimate and great. But it must not immobilize us from taking whatever steps we can, as Jews, citizens of freedom-affirming democracies, from helping bring as much international pressure as possible upon the Iranian regime.

But what can we do?

Hebrew University Professor Shlomo Avineri has an idea.

In a recent column in the Jerusalem Post headlined, "What Jewish organizations must do about Iran," he prescribes some steps that we might take. His advice, essentially, is to follow the social action model of world Jewry in the 1970s and 1980s in the struggle on behalf of Soviet Jews. The constant, unceasing, drum-beating pressure upon "Soviet diplomats all over the West," Avineri maintains, made their routine "into a daily nightmare and kept the issue at the top of the international agenda," which eventually contributed to a profound change in Soviet policy to Jewish emigration.

The issue today is Iran's Holocaust denial and the corollary, its apparent willingness to attempt the genocide of the Jews of Israel. Avineri thus suggests:

- Constant vigils and periodic demonstrations in front of Iranian embassies in every capital denouncing Iranian Holocaust denial;
- Demonstrations condemning Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial at every appearance of an Iranian official or diplomat, regardless of the topic of his presentation;
- Picketing all Iranian cultural functions;
- Lobbying our own governments to include the issue of Holocaust denial in all contacts with Iranian authorities; and
- Approaching universities to consider holding symposia on Iran's Holocaust denial.

Jewish communal leaders in Canada should take up Avineri's suggestions. Other leaders in other communities would soon follow. And then, perhaps, the Iranian regime might start feeling more pressure.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak told Jewish leaders and western heads of state that he was committed to the Camp David peace process and the extension of Palestinian self-determination. The meeting in Washington, which included Canadian Jewish Congress head Irwin Cotler, was part of Mubarak's first trip abroad since succeeding Anwar Sadat, who was assassinated.

Jewish dollars needed by Israelis

While there are those who think it very worthy that the Jewish Agency is currently involved with teaching Arabic to Jewish students as well as sponsoring gatherings for Arab and Jewish students, it seems to many of us in Israel that the Jewish people should first and foremost be concerned with the Jewish people ("Jewish Agency sponsors coexistence programs," CJN, Jan. 25). We have yet to see any of the Arab countries be concerned about Israeli Arabs or Jews for that matter. Why don't they help their own people? Why are Jewish dollars that are needed so badly by Jewish Israelis not coming to help them out?

Currently, more than 500,000 Jewish children in Israel live under the poverty line. Our Jewish Ethiopian communities are underfunded, too, resulting in preschool classes being devoid of any teaching materials. Lev U'Neshama in Safed just provided 100 three- to six-year-olds with winter shoes and socks, jackets, hats, gloves and scarves. The Jewish Agency is the organization responsible for making sure that these people are provided for, yet we keep hearing that this community is lacking many services.

How interesting it is then that the very people who stood on their rooftops last summer and cheered as the Hezbollah rockets flew overhead are now receiving help that is being denied to Israel's Jewish community. Perhaps this is the result of terrorism. The more the Israelis are terrorized, the faster we seem to give in to those causing the terror.

It's time to stop and check if these donations also include Canadian money. All donors must ask for accountability from any organization to which they donate. Make sure that the money that you give to Israel is coming to help Jews and not Arabs.

Egyptian Holocaust-denial conference

The International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ) condemns a Holocaust-denial conference held in Cairo, Egypt, on Dec. 27, 2006, under the banner "The Holocaust Lie."

As the Egyptian government is aware from its support of UN General Assembly Resolution 60/7, adopted unanimously on Nov. 1, 2005, it rejects, among other things, any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, either in full or in part, as a warning to all people of the dangers of hatred, bigotry, racism and prejudice and condemns without reserve all manifestations of religious intolerance, incitement, harassment or violence against persons or communities based on ethnic origin or religious belief, wherever they occur.

This is the reason why the IAJLJ decided to send a protest letter to the president of Egypt. The letter was submitted simultaneously on Jan. 29, 2007, to Egyptian embassies in the United States, Canada, England, France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Turkey, Bulgaria, Argentina, Finland, South Africa, Chile and Israel.

Isolating someone is against Jewish values

Nicole, the woman who is transitioning from being a man, clearly wishes to feel accepted, as a person and a Jew ("Orthodox man begins new life as a woman," CJN, Jan. 18). It takes great courage to meet the obstacles she faces. If one doesn't fit according to what the religious Jewish community expects, is that reason to exclude her? What about unmarried people and gays and lesbians? One may not agree with their choices, but ignoring or isolating the individual goes against Jewish values. What happened to compassion and tolerance, chaverim kol Yisrael?

Teachers should address school funding

If the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation, representing Ontario's public high school teachers, wants to get involved in human rights issues, they should start in their own backyard ("Secondary school teachers reject anti-Israel motion", CJN, Jan. 25).

Ontario's persistent official religious discrimination in faith-based school funding, in open violation of binding international human rights law, is a disgrace that would not be able to continue if key education stakeholders such as teachers unions would stand up and insist that official religious discrimination has no place in education in Ontario.

Since all three parties at Queen's Park support Catholic- school funding as guaranteed by the constitution, the only fair and viable solution to the discrimination is to allow the schools of the small religious minorities that are currently excluded to become part of Ontario's publicly funded education system. This would benefit not only students in non-Catholic faith-based schools and their families, but also the teachers in those schools, whose pay, benefits and working conditions are also adversely affected by the current discrimination. It would also benefit the public by facilitating the public regulation that goes along with public funding.

One Voice puts peace on World Economic Forum's agenda

By STEPHANIE L. FREID

"Each one of us needs to understand our power and our responsibility and take action by asking: 'What am I willing to do to end the conflict?'"

That statement was made in a video clip featuring young Palestinians and Israelis, which was presented at the World Economic Conference in Davos, Switzerland, two weeks ago.

The video presentation, which was aired via closed circuit to a conference room filled with hundreds of the world's most influential leaders, was the kickoff of the grassroots organization One Voice's $5 million "What are you willing to do to end the conflict?" campaign. Among those present for the screening were Klaus Schwab, founder and executive chairman of the World Economic Forum, Israel's Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israel's Foreign Minister Tzippi Livni.

The short broadcast showed images of One Voice's efforts to kick-start a Palestinian-Israeli dialogue and root out extremism through town hall meetings in Israel and the West Bank, leaflet dissemination, petition signing, rallies and marches, as well as interviews with moderates on both sides.

One Voice, founded by American Daniel Lubetzky in 2002, advocates empowering moderate Israelis and Palestinians while quelling extremist factions. The organization boasts a 250,000-strong membership.

"If we're going to end this conflict," former U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross conveyed in the video clip, "we need to address matters from the grassroots on up."

Grassroots voices included Chrissy Soudain of Jerusalem: "One Voice enables the Israeli and Palestinian people to take steps to propel political representatives towards a comprehensive political agreement," she said.

Miri Olifant of Tel Aviv said, "We still haven't won the war for peace."

Odeh Awwad of Bir Zeit University said, "But we will not stop engaging through non-violent action until we prevail."

An unidentified Palestinian man in the clip said, "It is the first time someone is asking Palestinians what they really think."

The clip ended with two kindergarten-aged children asking in Arabic and Hebrew: "What are we willing to do to end the conflict?"

> Advocates try to empower moderate Israelis and Palestinians while quelling extremist factions

Messages from town hall meetings in Tel Aviv, Ramallah and Jerusalem were then broadcast to attendees from One Voice directors and leaders stationed in each of the three cities.

"People in the audience – made up of extremely influential people – were moved to tears. Tens of thousands of people have seen the video and millions have seen reports about the gathering – and all of those felt a much-needed ray of hope," Lubetzky told ISRAEL21c following the summit.

After the screening, Abbas, Livni and Peres took turns at the dais expressing their reactions to the clip and voicing plans for the future. While Abbas and Livni launched into lengthy political addresses, they began by expressing hope and willingness for arriving at a peaceful solution. In her speech, Livni reiterated the need for a two-state solution and expressed commitment to the overall process.

"We all watched it with mixed feelings," Livni told the audience in Davos. "Sadness for lost opportunities but, on the other hand, hope. They gave me hope, but I think our responsibility is to give them hope. They are our children and our future. If there is something to come out of this room, it is a promise to generations to come to bring peace to our region."

Abbas reiterated the need for dialogue on a personal level, saying the presentation had also "instilled hope" in his heart. "In the past century, we have lived side by side but we didn't have the people-to-people relationship. We have reached that step now belatedly. Dialogue between sectors of society will lead to peace."

Peres stressed the connection between politics and economy, telling attendees that the two are inseparable. "The better the Palestinians have it, the better we will have it. That's the best thing we can do for ourselves. Fatah represents the future, Hamas the past," he said, referring to the moderate and extremist factions within the current Palestinian political realm.

In Ramallah, One Voice Palestine executive director Nisreen Shaheen – who watched the historical broadcast with dozens of like-minded Palestinians – expressed cautious optimism.

"For us as One Voice Palestine and Palestinians in general, it was an exciting moment to see the people's voice being heard by important world decision makers. But we felt like leaders listened to the voices in the video and then went back to their top-level political agendas and rhetoric," Shaheen told ISRAEL21c.

"But for us, it gave us a feeling that now there is a bigger responsibility and more effort to be dedicated."

And in Tel Aviv, Israel's One Voice executive director Gil Shami said that although appearances would suggest otherwise, he believes One Voice represents a majority in favour of ousting extremism.

"Many people ask me how it can be that the Hamas is in power – I'm saying Hamas is a metaphor for desperation. When the Oslo agreement was signed, 88 per cent of Palestinians supported it," Shami said. "They lost hope and the answer to desperation was Hamas. We saw with Lebanon this summer that missiles can hit Israeli cities. The situation requires urgency because desperation leads to catastrophe."

Lubetzky summed up the organization's efforts and results, saying: "We've been building this human infrastructure for five years, and in spite of the horrible atmosphere, or perhaps because of it, we are gaining more members and more momentum. People are ready to stand up and say, 'Enough!'"

Opinions

Israeli excels down under

Melbourne Park is among the world's most impressive sports venues. Home to the Australian Open, one of the four Grand Slam tournaments on the pro tennis circuit, the facility has two stadiums with retractable roofs and 22 outside courts that, unlike Wimbledon, are amply spaced to allow easy access for the thousands of spectators who stream through on each day of competition.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

This year's event, which I attended last month, will likely be remembered for two reasons. Firstly, there was the undisputed mastery of Roger Federer, who won the men's title for the third time – without dropping a set in his path to, and through, the finals. Secondly, and much less auspiciously, the opening day of play was marred by a violent clash between more than 150 young Australians of Serbian and Croatian descent.

Such ethnically motivated hooliganism, never before seen on the tennis tour, evoked a flurry of media discussion that focused, with inevitable ambiguity, on just the sorts of issues that would make a Canadian visitor feel right at home: immigration policies, societal values, the pros and cons of multiculturalism, and the anathema of "old-world nationalism."

But for the Jewish community, whether from Melbourne or elsewhere, and even more especially for visitors from Israel who were at the Open, what will most be remembered is the maturing of a new force in women's tennis: 19-year-old, Jerusalem-born Shahar Peer.

Though Peer has been steadily improving since she turned professional in 2004 – and notwithstanding that she came into the tournament as the 16th seed – her recent performance far exceeded anything that she'd previously achieved. After handily disposing of the Russian third seed, Svetlana Kuznetsova, in the fourth round, she came within a hair's breadth of beating former world Number 1 Serena Williams, who later went on to win the women's title.

This was the first time that an Israeli woman had ever reached the quarterfinals of a Grand Slam tennis tournament, and Peer's performance down under will now raise her world ranking to the highest ever attained by an Israeli, male or female.

From the outer courts of her earlier matches to the showcase Rod Laver Arena, where she held almost 15,000 fans spellbound as she mounted her epic comeback from 1-4 down in the final set (which Williams eventually won 8-6), Peer was followed by a spirited band of devoted supporters who, draped in Israeli flags, loudly and unabashedly spurred her on whenever she won, or lost, a point.

In an interview after the quarterfinals, Peer expressed her pride in being Israeli. No doubt the many Israelis who woke at 4 a.m. their time to catch the live feed of her nail biter against Williams felt similarly.

The Palestinians' defining moment?

For the second time in less than a month, the Palestinians are on the brink of civil war. Dozens of armed men and civilians have been killed in street fighting that erupted Jan. 25 between militias of the radical Hamas and the secular Fatah movements.

Leslie Susser in Jerusalem

The latest round of violence erupted just days after top-level efforts to set up a joint Hamas-Fatah government of national unity failed. That left Hamas in power and the international boycott, imposed in the wake of its refusal to recognize Israel, in place.

The showdown is over policy toward Israel and the kind of society the Palestinians are trying to build. The fighting is partly an attempt by Fatah to create conditions for lifting the international boycott, which is causing the Palestinian Authority severe hardship.

The stakes are high. The outcome of the fighting could have a significant bearing on chances for Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking and determine whether the Palestinians join the moderate pro-western Arab camp or side with the radicals led by Iran.

Over the past few months, Fatah, in anticipation of the showdown, has been building its military power with western help. Israel, which also would like to see a Fatah victory, is monitoring the fighting very closely but won't intervene to avoid making Fatah look like Israel's stooge.

The fighting erupted on the anniversary of Hamas' sweeping election victory in January 2006. The ostensible cause was the car-bomb killing of a Hamas activist in the Jabalya refugee camp in Gaza. But the deeper reason was the effect on Palestinian society of Hamas' bleak year in office.

Most significantly, the economic hardship caused by the boycott intensified an already widespread breakdown of law and order. Armed gangs for months have been roaming the streets, loyal in many cases to family or tribe rather than to one or the other of the larger organizations.

Pundits say further atomization of Palestinian society can only be prevented by a strong central government with clear political and social objectives. And that can only come about if either Fatah or Hamas wins a resounding victory in their struggle, or if the two organizations find a way of working together.

For months, PA President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah has been trying to set up a joint Hamas-Fatah unity government acceptable to the international community. This, Abbas believes, would pave the way toward lifting the international boycott and starting negotiations with Israel.

But so far he has been unable to come up with a formula acceptable to Hamas, which refuses to meet the international community's three conditions for a resumption of aid: recognition of Israel's right to exist, a repudiation of terrorism and acceptance of past agreements the Palestinian Authority signed with Israel.

On Jan. 21, Abbas and Khaled Mashaal, Hamas' Damascus-based leader-in-exile, met in a last-ditch effort to agree on terms for a joint government. They failed and, a few days later, the fighting resumed. Hamas blames Israel and the West for the renewed internecine warfare.

Israeli pundits see the clash as more than a local power struggle. Roni Shaked, Yediot Achronot's Arab affairs analyst, described it as "a war over Palestinian identity" that he predicted would have repercussions far beyond the Gaza Strip.

It is a war, Shaked wrote, "between Fatah, which wants a secular-national identity, and Hamas, which seeks to establish a Palestinian-Islamic identity. It is a war between western values and Islam. Therefore the fate of the Hamas government will not be decided in Gaza or Ramallah, but in Tehran and Washington."

Fearful that the unrest could spill over to their own countries, moderate regional players have been trying to mediate before the fighting in Gaza gets out of hand. The Saudis have invited Fatah and Hamas representatives to Mecca for talks, and a Gaza-based Egyptian contingent has been trying to negotiate a ceasefire.

On the other side of the ideological fence, Islamic Jihad, the Palestinian terror organization closest to Iran, also wants to stop the fighting. The group claimed credit for the suicide bombing in Eilat last week that killed three people, reportedly wanting to send a message to the other terrorist groups to stop fighting each other and refocus their attacks on Israel.

Fatah, though, seems intent on forcing the issue with Hamas – if not this time, then in the coming weeks or months.

Some Israeli pundits maintain that the hatred on both sides now is so great that there can be only one result: a fight to the finish.

A clear-cut victory by either side would certainly change the Israeli-Palestinian equation – for better or for worse. But will the antagonists go all the way, or will they pull back at the brink, as they always have in the past? The next few weeks and months could be crucial.

How the Diaspora can help fix Israel

Like many other Israelis, I have stopped watching, listening to or reading the local news. This is very difficult for people who have been addicted to news bulletins for decades – to tell us what threat is coming next, and also to give us reassurance that Israel is still on the map. But now, sensationalist headlines and photos focus on the unimaginable immorality and corruption of our leaders.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

How did we reach this point of extreme embarrassment and profound sense of betrayal? It's true that the stress from constant wars and terror devours much of the energy in Israeli society, and in these circumstances, it's difficult to turn attention to internal reform. But the recent war with Hezbollah demonstrated that the two phenomena are connected – bad and corrupt leadership also leads to disaster.

In addition, an antiquated electoral system based on backroom deal-making encourages corruption and mediocrity among public officials, driving away the best and the brightest. And many Israelis come from countries without a tradition of democracy, open government and accountability.

But none of this excuses the failure of the Jewish state to live up to the moral and ethical principles of the prophetic tradition (in contrast to the kings and priests of the first and second Temples, whose behaviour was no better than the current group). We need a massive change in the behaviour of both the religious and secular political leadership, and a school curriculum that teaches civic values and responsibilities, instead of highlighting narrow ideologies. And we need new institutions, based on transparency, due process, and mutual respect (including the end to sexual harassment and other forms of exploitation). On this basis, an entirely new generation of leaders must be encouraged to enter public service.

The responsibility for leading this process falls on all parts of society. While many Israeli journalists, academics, writers, artists, filmmakers and other public figures have claimed the mantle of the Prophets, and imitate their fiery biblical rhetoric, this is often wasted on false prophecies, including "solutions" to the Palestinian conflict, or baseless attacks against religious or secular groups. In parallel, much of the religious leadership has also focused on divisive and political causes and false messiahs.

In this process, Diaspora Jewry, which is a partner in so many aspects of Israeli life, can play an important supporting role. Unfortunately, for many years, Jewish donors based in North America and Europe have also selected the wrong objectives, providing huge amounts of money to support their own agendas rather than core Israeli needs. For example, the New Israel Fund confuses the conflict between Israeli Arabs and Jews with the U.S. Civil Rights movement in the 1950s and '60s, in which they participated. Many of the fringe groups they fund promote the destruction of Israel.

The funds provided by generous Diaspora Jews to religious institutions and education in Israel should also be used to support the teaching of ethical standards that are part of the Jewish heritage, but have been forgotten. In Israel, the mix of religion, politics, and public funding is highly corrupting, while the moral authority of the religious leadership is essentially non-existent. By supporting programs that encourage moral leadership among rabbis and educators, world Jewry can help lead Israeli society to a much-needed new beginning.

But as Israeli citizens, we are responsible for changing our leaders and the system that encourages immorality. This process will require personal involvement from all sectors of society. Business leaders and former military officers who have demonstrated their ability to inspire people and lead without corruption need to re-enter public life and politics. Educators must teach children (and their parents) about public responsibilities and civic virtue.

A century ago, as the framework for political Zionism was being formulated by Theodore Herzl and his followers, Achad Ha'am (Asher Greenberg) warned that the goal of a "state like all others" was unworthy of this effort – he said the Jewish people had the obligation to be "a light unto the nations." Herzl won that argument, but now, the need for cultural Zionism based on morality and ethical principles is more acute than ever.

The Kirshner File

Iran's influence in the Mideast is growing steadily

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The spectre of Iran's ascendancy in the Middle East is surely concentrating many minds these days.

As a budding member of the nuclear club, Iran – the pre-eminent Shiite power in Islam – is expanding its influence at a steady clip under the leadership of its firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction and denied the Holocaust. The shadow that Iran casts in the region has alarmed not only Israel, but Sunni Arab states such as Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Egypt and the United States as well.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, speaking at a recent security affairs conference in Herzliya, said that Iran has markedly increased its influence by funnelling financial, military and intelligence assistance to radical Palestinian groups – Hamas and Islamic Jihad – and by supporting Hezbollah and insurgents in Iraq.

King Abdullah II of Jordan, whose late father signed a 1994 peace treaty with Israel, has warned that Iran is seeking to establish "a Shiite crescent" in the area through proxies in Iraq, Lebanon and Syria.

Saudi Arabia, the historic seat of Islam, fears that Iran's rising influence in Iraq, coupled with Iran's overarching ambition to create a nuclear arsenal, could pose a threat and even destabilize its legitimacy. King Abdullah's determination to restrain Iran is such that the Saudi oil minister recently declared that Saudi Arabia – the world's top oil producer – is committed to maintaining "moderate prices" in the face of Iran's opposition.

For the Saudis, the future of Iraq is of paramount importance. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah recently told U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney that if Washington pulls its troops out of Iraq precipitously, the withdrawal could touch off a Shiite massacre of Sunnis and thus compel Saudi Arabia to intervene.

Egypt, which restored diplomatic relations with Iran in 2004 after a break of 15 years, is just as worried by Iran's possible intentions in Iraq. Last week, Al Ahram, a semi-official daily published in Cairo, expressed concern that Iran is trying to undermine Egypt's influence in Iraq and pry Iraq away from the Arab world. Al Ahram, Egypt's largest newspaper, also accused Iran of involvement in the 2005 assassination of its ambassador in Baghdad.

The fears, concerns and accusations voiced by Israel and Sunni Arab states are shared by the United States. Condoleezza Rice, the U.S. secretary of state, has talked about Iran's "destabilizing behaviour," while Stephen Hadley, President George W. Bush's national security advisor, claims that Iran's strategic objective is "to establish hegemony" in the Middle East.

Having rejected a recommendation by the Iraq Study Group to engage Iran (and Syria) to stabilize Iraq, the Bush administration – though officially committed to "a diplomatic path," as Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns noted last week – has adopted a confrontational position.

Bush has sent two U.S. Navy aircraft carrier battle groups to the Persian Gulf and deployed additional Patriot anti-missile batteries in the Gulf States. Not since the allied invasion of Iraq in 2003 has the United States placed two aircraft carriers in the gulf, a development that has triggered speculation that Washington may ultimately use military means to force Iran to abandon its militarized nuclear program.

Iran, however, is not backing down. Last month, shortly after the United Nations voted unanimously to impose mild sanctions on Iran in a bid to stop its uranium enrichment activities, the director of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization said that Iran had no intention of caving in to pressure. More ominously, Iran is soon due to inform the International Atomic Energy Agency that it intends to manufacture uranium on an industrial scale.

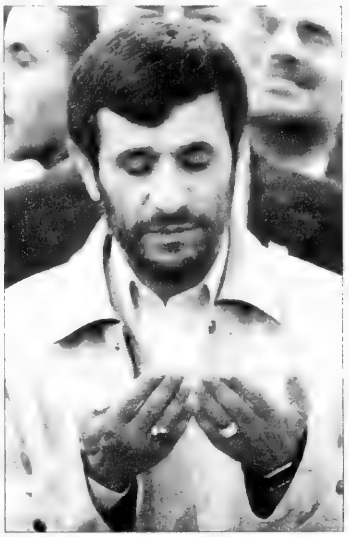
As part of its efforts to contain Iran, the United States has cracked down on Iran's activities in Iraq – raiding an Iranian diplomatic office, detaining Iranian security officials and, more bluntly, threatening to kill Iranian agents who are colluding with insurgents.

In general, Washington claims that Iran is meddling in Iraqi affairs and supplying Shiite and Sunni rebels with sophisticated bombs that have been used to kill scores of American soldiers in roadside attacks.

On the political front, Iran has courted prominent Iraqi Shiites such as Moqtada Al Sadar, whose Mahdi Army has fought the Americans in two bloody insurrections, and Grand Ayatollah Ali Al Sistani, the de facto leader of the mainstream Shiite community.

Shortly after the current Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal Al Maliki, took office last May, Iran's foreign minister, Manuchehr Mottaki, led a high-profile delegation to Iraq. Of late, under the guise of helping Iraq, Iran has signed military co-operation, intelligence and commercial agreements with the Iraqis.

Tehran does not conceal its aim of forging substantive economic and military relations with Iraq. Its ambassador to Iraq, Hassan Kazemi Qumi, told the New York Times on Jan. 28 that Iran is prepared to offer Iraqi forces training, equipment and advisors to combat terrorism, and is primed to play a role in the reconstruction of Iraq.



Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The United States is convinced that Iran's real objective in Iraq is to promote "managed chaos" in order to hasten a U.S. withdrawal. Deeply suspicious of Iran, Washington still remembers the 1979 takeover of its embassy in Tehran and the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut, perpetrated by the pro-Iranian group Hezbollah. Iran, having supplied Hezbollah with some of the rockets it used to bombard Israel in last summer's war, has strengthened its relationship with that Lebanese movement and has thereby extended its influence in Lebanon, a nation riven by sectarianism.

Iran is also cultivating the Hamas government in the Palestinian areas and supporting its long-range goal of eradicating Israel. As Iran's supreme spiritual leader, Ali Khameini, said recently, "The day will yet come when all of Palestine will be under Palestinian rule." He made this comment this past December, when Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, visited Tehran and declared that Iran provides "strategic depth" for the Palestinians. Iran, a major oil and gas producer, donated $120 million (US) to Hamas in 2006, and has promised a further $250 million this year.

In addition, as the 2002 Karine-A naval incident illustrated, Iran has supplied the Palestinians with a considerable quantity of weapons and munitions. Iran, which has close ties with Syria, is reportedly giving Hamas militants the same kind of advanced military training as Hezbollah fighters received prior to the 2006 war in Lebanon.

As a result, key figures in Fatah, Hamas' rival, have accused Iran of pushing the Palestinians toward civil war in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

There is no doubt that Iran's ascendancy in the Middle East is partly due to its ardent support of the Palestinian cause and of Hezbollah. But Washington's war on terrorism since the events of Sept. 11, 2001, has also bolstered Iran. By invading Afghanistan and Iraq, the United States eliminated two of Iran's main Sunni rivals – the Taliban regime in Kabul and the Saddam Hussein dictatorship in Baghdad – but failed to fill the void with strong replacements.

Washington is paying the price for its interventionist policy, while Israel may be even be wondering whether Saddam Hussein's Iraq, for all its menace and horrors, was perhaps less dangerous than Ahmadinejad's revolutionary Iran.

Getting our hands dirty while doing good in Israel

By LAURYN KRONICK
Special to The CJN

The pale blue paint that was beginning to cover the walls gave off a warm and inviting tone.

On each side of the room, four painters clad in bright red jumpsuits and matching hats were hard at work creating an outdoor theme. As they painted, they cracked jokes, talked about the Jewish communities in their hometowns, reminisced about their past trips to Israel and talked about how this one was vastly different.

Less than seven months earlier, this newly painted room was drab – white-walled and grey. Except then, it was full of people hiding from the Katyusha rockets that were bombarding Metulla, a small, northern Israeli town.

The rooms that were being redecorated were bomb shelters. During the Israel-Hezbollah war last summer, the shelters were overcrowded and the conditions inside were far from optimal, since many of them had not been properly maintained over the years.

The destruction left by the war inspired a new program called Leading Up North. More than 500 young Jews from all over the world travelled to Northern Israel in December and January for a community service project funded by philanthropist Lynn Shusterman and organized by the Center for Leadership Initiatives (CLI), Hillel, the Israel on Campus Coalition and the Jewish Coalition for Service.

Each group's 10-day venture was unique. I was one of the lucky 35 participants on a bus made up of young Jewish professionals from all over the world – Canada, India, Australia, Denmark, Spain, the United States, and elsewhere.

This "super bus," as we adoringly called it, was full of people who are all doing different things in life. Artists, journalists, lawyers, some involved in politics and others, all came together with one common goal: a burning desire to help rebuild and replenish an area we care deeply for, and to help its residents get on with their lives.

Our trip was broken down into three parts: the first was painting bomb shelters in Metulla, the next was cutting down trees that were burned by Katyusha rockets, and the last involved volunteering at Festival B'Shekel, a massive celebration in Kiryat Shmonah that drew thousands of people and featured musical performances by popular Israeli bands, most notably Hadag Nachash.

Working in Metulla was the most inspiring and influential part of the trip for me. While we were painting bomb shelters, we met town residents and heard their stories of where they were and how they felt during the war. And working alongside Israelis our own age helped us gain a more personal understanding about what life was like last summer and how northern residents tried to get back to normal life as soon as the war ended.

Ruchama Nakash, head of education in Metulla, was our guide and mentor for the four days we spent in the town. Her house sits right next to the Lebanese border, where she could see tanks outside her window and rockets soaring over her.

"In our area, we think the most important thing is to strengthen community and build curriculum on how to be strong," she told us. "The strongest you can be [is by participating] in young leadership."

Nakash explained that during the war, Metulla's strong community ties were what helped people maintain their emotional strength. As one of the town's municipal leaders, she helped organize a small group of youths to help look after younger children so they could retain some level of normalcy during their stay in the bomb shelters.

More than 100 volunteers helped distribute food, took children out of Metulla for short getaways, and provided entertainment and activities to pass the time.

In celebration of our hard work, our group was invited to the elementary school in Metulla for a performance by several of the children. We were treated to a showcase of Hebrew songs performed by kids as young as five and then were thrust into the middle of an Israeli dancing circle, where we mingled with little ones, parents, town council members and other residents.

As we danced the horah, a strong wave of accomplishment and triumph washed over me as I realized that our group had actually created something concrete that will help residents in the future.

Now that they have a warmer, more welcoming atmosphere, the bomb shelters will be used as community spaces.

Our group's motto throughout the week was that we wanted to do something and get our hands dirty while doing it.

With our bright red, paint-stained overalls – which can now be found in our respective homes around the world – our experience with Leading Up North may be over for now, but the impetus for future projects is strong and they will no doubt happen.

Lauryn Kronick is in her final year of the journalism program at Concordia University. A version of this story first appeared in the Link, Concordia's independent student newspaper.

Israeli rabbinical court rulings favour men: lawyer

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Reluctance on the part of the rabbinical courts to modernize Israeli divorce law is not just a religious issue. It affects every Jewish citizen who gets married in Israel, Yaffa Epstein said.

Epstein, who made aliyah to Israel nine years ago and holds a law degree from Bar Ilan University, was in Toronto last week to speak about the power dynamics of divorce in Jewish law.

In the same week, Epstein, who has taught several classes at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, held lectures throughout the city on a wide array of topics, including an interdenominational dialogue titled "Why Do We Argue?" and a multifaith dialogue organized by Hillel, the Muslim Student Association and Compass, a Christian student group, called "Modesty and Modernity."

During the Israeli divorce-law lecture, which was held at Osgoode Hall Law School on Jan. 25, she said that according to Halachah, a married couple is able to divorce only when the husband willingly grants his wife a divorce, or a get, and his wife accepts it from him.

This puts all the power in the hands of the men, who can use the get as a bargaining chip to negotiate custody, property division and other issues that come with divorce, said Epstein, who is also on the executive board of Mavoi Satum, an Israeli organization that helps women trapped in the divorce process.

"In terms of marriage and divorce, the rabbinic courts and all other religious courts have sole jurisdiction, which means that there is no such thing as civil marriage or divorce in Israel," she said.

But for certain issues, the civil and rabbinic courts have joint jurisdiction, she added.

"For example, custody, alimony, child support, adoption, maternity, division of property, [over] all of those issues – both courts have jurisdiction."

But wherever the case is filed first is the court that has jurisdiction.

She said that when she was in law school, she learned about the "race of jurisdiction." She was told that if she got a male client, to run to the rabbinical court, which is most likely to rule in his favour, and if she gets a female client, to run to the civil courts.

"Often the woman has to give up property, or custody, just to get a divorce and then she'll try to fight in a civil court [to get everything back]," Epstein said.

Husbands can blackmail their wives with a get, and there are thousands of cases involving men who refuse to grant a get at all, which can trap a woman in a marriage indefinitely, Epstein said, adding that the average non-contested divorce in Israel takes four years.

Mavoi Satum aims to help the thousands of agunot, women whose husbands are unable to give them a get because they are missing or for some other reason such as mental illness, and mesuravot get, women who have been refused a Jewish divorce by their husbands. The organization offers legal and emotional support, and it lobbies within Israeli legislative bodies for a solution to the problem.

Epstein, who is pursuing a master's degree in Talmud, said that within Halachah, there are a number of solutions aimed at preventing the problem of get refusal.

"But the rabbinic courts in Israel do not like divorce and regard it as a product of modernization, or feminism," she said.

"The civil courts understand that this is a huge issue in Jewish law, and the rabbinic courts are not interested in trying to solve the issue."

In an effort to address the issue for secular Jews who don't want to marry through the rabbinical courts, the civil courts in Israel have developed one of the most advanced systems of common-law marriage in the world.

"So many benefits are granted to common-law couples because they don't want people to be forced into marrying religiously."

The civil courts grant them the same benefits and the same tax breaks that are granted to a married couple.

She said that one of the solutions to the problem is to get couples to sign a prenuptial agreement stating that if one wants to divorce, the other will not stand in the way. That means that the husband will agree to give the get and the woman will agree to receive the get.

Have fathers become "irrelevant"?

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

On January 29, 2007 the father of a newborn infant in Saskatoon was denied custody of his biological son in favour of adoptive parents. The baby's mother never told the father she was pregnant and had given the child up for adoption without the father's consent. How could this happen? The courts have the power to award custody to anyone, even against a child's biological parent, based solely on the child's best interests. In this case the adoptive parents were highly educated, stable, with excellent jobs: they could give the child a promising future. By comparison, Dad only had a Grade 8 education and was in the process of getting divorced. The result was that Dad was even forbidden from visiting his own biological son in the first year and possibly forbidden to see the child thereafter.

In my view, this is a very disturbing decision. When the courts use largely economic criteria to determine the "best interests" of the child and override the child's right to be raised with his biological parent for monetary reasons, then the courts have distorted the essence of what a family truly means. We might as well be living in Aldous Huxley's Brave New World where children are taken away from their parents and assigned to whomever society deems is "best" for them to be raised by. Moreover, if it was a poor mother with a grade 8 education fighting for her infant against comparatively stable, rich parents where substance abuse or violence was not an issue, can any reader possibly imagine a similar result? Clearly this man is being discriminated against solely because he is male and a father, pure and simple. This decision now legally signifies, compared to cases with mothers in identical circumstances, that a child's biological relationship to his father is irrelevant as compared to his mother. I use the word "irrelevant" — not "less important" — because in this case it appears unlikely that the child will ever see his father again.

Of equal importance is the indifference with which this court treats the biological bond between a child and his father, whatever may be Dad's educational background. Beethoven came from a poor family of nine children. The Beatles all came from modest homes. Do we wrench children from their biological fathers because others can provide "better homes"? Is this what the feminist revolution has now finally wrought, to make a child's relationship to his biological father ultimately disposable because Dad is not a high-school graduate? It is time that the importance of biological ties is reasserted as being of primary importance in most cases when interpreting the term "best interests," Dads included.

Edmonton shul vandalized with Nazi symbols

Beth Israel Synagogue marks congregation's 100th anniverary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Edmonton's Beth Israel Synagogue was vandalized with Nazi symbols only hours before a gala celebration was held to mark the congregation's 100th anniversary.

At around 3:30 p.m. on Jan. 28, a swastika was found on the shul's front doors in black ink along with the warning, "This means not welcome… Get out." Similar epithets were left on exterior walls.

Police are investigating security tapes hoping to identify the perpetrators, according to congregation president Michael Zabludowski.

Photographs were taken of the graffiti, which was wiped clean before 430 guests arrived to mark the anniversary of the city's oldest synagogue. Alberta Premier Ed Stelmach and Mayor Stephen Mandel, Edmonton's first Jewish mayor, were among the dignitaries present.

"The premier was aware of it," Zabludowski said. "We did not broadcast it. We did not leave it up. We did not want to interject it into a marvelous celebration.

"The premier was appalled, but we did not let it take away from the joy of the event.

"I don't think there are issues of fear in the community," he added.

Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton was hit with graffiti just prior to celebrating its 100th anniversary gala.

The suburban Beth Israel Synagogue has been struck with "minor graffiti" over the past few years as has the downtown Beth Shalom Synagogue, "but nothing quite as brazen as this," Zabludowski said. "Edmonton is actually low by B'nai Brith records in terms of hate crimes."

In December 2005, the Beth Shalom was vandalized with a swastika and the acronym ZOG, a term used by anti-Semites to refer to an alleged "Zionist Occupation Government."

In November 2000, as the intifadah gathered steam in the Middle East, the Beth Israel and the Beth Shalom synagogues were firebombed on the same night.

A young Palestinian immigrant, Yousef Sandouga, was jailed for 2½ years for the Beth Shalom incident, which the presiding judge referred to as a "terrorist act."

Zabludowski said there is yet no evidence of the motive behind the current incident, but he speculated, "It's local teenagers. I don't feel it's organized. It's just the ongoing kind of graffiti you get, but that has yet to be determined."

The Beth Israel has received informal messages of support from other community organizations concerned about the incident, Zabludowski added.

The gala went on as planned. Keynote speaker was journalist and author David Frum, a former speechwriter to U.S. President George W. Bush, and entertainment was provided by the Vancouver Jewish Men's Choir.

A display called "100 years of memories" – an anniversary book that chronicles the congregation's first 100 years – was unveiled.

Jewish communal activity in Edmonton can be traced back to Aug. 12, 1906, when the Edmonton Hebrew Association was created. It would later evolve into the Beth Israel Synagogue.

Clark raps Harper government on Mideast

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former prime minister Joe Clark pointedly criticized Prime Minister Stephen Harper's stance on the Israeli-Arab conflict, saying the current Conservative government has put Canada's "balanced and careful" Middle East foreign policy in jeopardy.

In a Jan. 31 address at McGill University, Clark said Harper made a "mistake" in making withdrawal of support from the Hamas-led Palestinian government his first major foreign policy action after taking office just over a year ago.

Clark also termed "ill-judged" Harper's strongly pro-Israel position during Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon last summer.

Joe Clark

Clark said he finds "troubling" the Conservative government's "closeness to the foreign policies of the United States administration" to the exclusion of Canada's interests in the rest of the world.

Clark was Progressive Conservative prime minister for nine months in 1979-80, and minister of external affairs under prime minister Brian Mulroney from 1984 to 1991.

Since October, he has been a professor of practice for public-private sector partnerships at McGill's Centre for Developing Area Studies.

He said Harper is moving away from the "constructive role" Canada has developed over the past 25 years in the Middle East under successive Liberal and Progressive Conservative governments, without making clear where he is going.

Canada, he said, worked hard over the years to be a "reliable interlocutor" between Israelis and Arabs. "Not many other countries have that reputation," he said.

The Harper government, he suggested, appears not to understand the "complexity on the ground… One of the lessons I learned was the Palestinian issue is very much symbolic for the developing world."

Clark disputed Harper's opinion, stated in a year-end interview, that Canada has been "completely absent" from the Middle East in the past decade.

"Apart from being flatly false, that rebuke is even more unsettling as either a warning shot, or an unguarded statement of belief, by the prime minister who so dominates this government."

He said Harper should acknowledge that he erred, as Clark himself had to do on "one celebrated occasion." He was referring to the diplomatic crisis he set off just two days after being sworn in as prime minister when he announced Canada would move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, fulfilling a campaign promise.

He quickly dropped the plan in the wake of outrage from the Arab and Islamic world.

Clark interprets sending Foreign Minister Peter MacKay to the Middle East last month as an attempt to "repair the damage of the hard lines" Harper took upon coming into office.

Clark's address was a broad critique of the Harper government's foreign policy in general. He said he hoped his remarks would spark public debate on where Harper is taking Canada in the international arena. He said others have similar concerns but are not in a position to raise them openly.

"There has not been much public debate about what motivates the changes, or what their consequences might be. Moreover, there is no evidence that they are the result of advice from the foreign ministry or other customary sources, including the platform or resolutions of Mr. Harper's party."

He said Harper is taking too much direction from the Bush administration and letting Canada's relations with rest of the world deteriorate. This may be shortsighted, he said, because the United States's reputation and authority is declining in the world, while the relative power of other countries, notably China and India, is growing.

Clark said he has no trouble with a Canadian government being close to the White House, but said that "what is troubling is focusing on one relationship so exclusively."

This is undermining Canada's relations elsewhere, especially with developing countries, and a waste of the multilateral skills this country has been known for.

Canada is most effective internationally when it is, "simultaneously, as close as possible to the U.S. and as active and independent as possible in the wider world," Clark said.

"Those are not opposite positions. They are the two sides of the Canadian coin, and both must be given attention or we debase our currency."

As close as Mulroney was to Washington, Clark noted, the Palestinians' right to self-determination was one of the key issues on which Canada and the United States disagreed while Clark was external affairs minister.

Since World War II, Canada has built trust and earned respect in parts of the world where the United States "might only generate envy or fear." The consequence is that developing nations may look elsewhere to less exemplary countries than Canada for influence.

Harper's tendency not to take advice, as elected leaders traditionally have, from civil servants and diplomats has led to "the erosion of the status of Canada's professional foreign service," Clark said, which is "widely recognized as one of the best in the world."

A lack of resources and appreciation will discourage talented people from pursuing a career in the public service, he said.

Clark noted that he had more resources at his disposal than any foreign minister who has come after him, and "substantial freedom to set policy, including in some cases, when the prime minister disagreed."

Canada's 'balanced and careful' foreign policy in jeopardy, says former PM

Synagogue symposium examines climate change

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Does being a good Jew mean being environmentally responsible?

In an address to more than 100 community members at a Climate Change Symposium on a recent Sunday morning, Cantor Ari Isenberg of Halifax's Shaar Shalom Synagogue said the answer is an emphatic "yes."

Co-ordinated by Clean Nova Scotia, the Atlantic Jewish Council, JNF Canada and the synagogue, the symposium brought together keynote speaker Richard Zurawski, a meteorologist and scientist; Stephen King, Halifax's head of resource management; Daisy Kidston, education programmer with Clean Nova Scotia; and Isenberg to discuss global warming issues.

Isenberg stressed that Jews must revert back to the respect for the environment noted in several parts of the Torah and practised during the harvest festivals of Sukkot, Shavuot and Pesach.

He said the celebration of Tu b'Shvat, the new year of the trees and agriculture, reminds Jews of the spiritual lesson of the tree – that it's not merely a plant that produces fruit and shade, but a symbol of life and an upright person.

"Tu b'Shvat reminds us of our responsibility [to the environment], but we have drifted and become abusive to it," he said.

Zurawski, a graduate of University of Toronto and University of Windsor and a practising meteorologist for more than 30 years, is a documentary filmmaker, television producer and chief meteorologist for Rogers Radio.

He said the planet will continue to exist and life will go on despite climate change, but people have to realize what's at stake.

"We have had recent seasons that were atypical, the warmest since records have been kept [for the last 120 years]. Recent storms in Europe, drought and fires in Australia tell us maybe something is really going on."

Even though political leaders have jumped on the bandwagon, "we can't trust the governments who will bend the rules and spout rhetoric," Zurawski said.

"Nothing will change from the top down. While the media seems to negate global warming, and no wonder the public doesn't realize it's happening, it's up to the people to take responsibility and change the way we think, what we do, become more efficient, mitigate what we buy and consume, and be vocal."

He said, "We can't wait 50 years, or even 20 or 10. We have to talk to those who determine policy now and put up road blocks to anti-environmental behaviour."

King talked of Halifax's efforts to reduce greenhouse gasses by setting targets for reduction, changing over in certain areas from oil to natural gas, and leading its citizens by example.

Kidston noted that there has been increased interest among faith groups about how to be energy efficient. "Many leaders of old churches, in large buildings, have discussed with us ways of reducing energy costs," she said.

"Global warming is an issue that affects all faith groups. I'd be very interested in working with your youth [in the Jewish community] to educate and translate that into action."

Phil Warman, president of Shaar Shalom, said later that his board is already using programmable thermostats to reduce the temperature when the shul's building is not in use. As well, the shul's oil-fuelled boiler has been upgraded to improve efficiency, and energy-efficient light bulbs have been installed.

"And we've started a program to collect and recycle containers and eliminated Styrofoam products and reduce use of disposable paper products and utensils to reduce the garbage bill," he said.

"We're even starting to compost non-meat and non-dairy products left over from food functions to reduce the garbage bill," he added.

Moderator Cara Tax, a former Shaar Shalom president, using an aboriginal proverb, reminded the audience, "We do not inherit the earth from our ancestors. We borrow it for our children."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Love, actually

Guest Voice

By RABBI ADIN STEINSALTZ

Love is such a used, abused and misused word that people should possibly stay away from it. How would I define it? In essence, love is the basic experience of caring about another, of going out from myself toward the other.

Love requires caring – not caring about what benefit or enjoyment I can gain from you, but finding joy in the very fact of your existence. When I say "I love you," the truthfulness of my statement depends on the size of the "I" and the size of the "you": The bigger the "I," the smaller the love. But if the "I" is smaller than the "you," then we have the sense that we are dealing with love.

This does not mean that there is no sense of self. There must still be an "I" in "I love you," because there must be a self to feel the emotion. A newborn cannot love, because he has no notion of the difference between himself and the other. A few months later, he sees the other as a reflection of himself, and later, he realizes that the other is a separate entity. It is when one gets to the point of seeing the other as different, but still similar, that a true relationship begins. And with that relationship comes the ability to care. The child now has the tools to develop his inborn capacity to love – he may or may not be able to get there.

One outcome of this definition of love is that the more self-interest there is, the more the relationship is self-oriented rather than object-oriented, and therefore, the less genuine that love. If I say that I love a food, whether I just grab anything and shove it in my mouth, or approach a meal like a gourmet – pampering it and admiring it, and then putting it in my mouth – the "love" is the same: My concern is for me and my satisfaction. It is the same with the love I have for a person. If my "love" for my wife is defined by sex or my "love" for my son is defined by nachas, then I do not really understand what love is.

When I truly love, what matters is the relationship itself, not the benefit I derive from it. The most exalted love is entirely other-oriented: it is the love I have for nature, which I cannot change or own. And it is Jacob's love for Rachel, which endured through seven years and longer (whether a few days or another seven years), because it was the fact of the relationship that mattered, not any tangible benefit to him.

If genuine love is so demanding, can we ever fulfil the mitzvah of loving our neighbour as ourselves? Love may be too difficult, but compassion is not. To be compassionate – and this is the exact meaning of the word – is to feel the feelings of the other. That is something we can do, on a personal level, and even on a wider level. No one can demand that people should love poor people far away, but compassion is something we can have. And if we have this feeling of compassion, we may do something good for them, even if it will not pay off for us immediately, or indeed at any future time. Compassion is a lot like love in that respect, because it is possible that there will be no personal benefit. The difference is that it is easier to achieve.

Genuine love is something that may always be just out of reach, but compassion is in our hands. If we have no compassion, we become emotionally hardened and unable to have any kind of feeling, because loss of compassion is the loss of a component of the human psyche. If we do not act on compassion, we become mechanized beings – like robots, but worse, because they do not have our physical weaknesses and limitations.

Having compassion is a matter of keeping our humanity. It is perhaps something we need for ourselves. We need it in order to keep living as human beings. Otherwise, we will destroy everything that is not useful, that is not productive, that does not pay off. Then we will destroy the whole world, because when people are behaving without compassion, they cease to be human beings, and the world itself has no meaning.

So let us not be so concerned about love. Let us speak about compassion, about feeling what others feel. Perhaps that can improve the world.

Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, who was born and lives in Jerusalem, is internationally regarded as one of the leading rabbinic and academic scholars of our time.

A deep, pathological self-loathing

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Let's play a game, albeit a rather distressing and unpleasant one. Identify the following speakers/authors.

1) "Calls to destroy Israel, or to throw it into the Mediterranean Sea… are not evidence of hatred of Jews," but simply reflect a "quarrel with the State of Israel."

2) Regarding the best way to help the Palestinians: "If an effective strategy means encouraging reasonable anti-Semitism, or reasonable hostility to Jews, I don't care. If it means encouraging vicious, racist anti-Semitism, or the destruction of the State of Israel, I still don't care… To regard any shedding of Jewish blood as a world-shattering calamity… is racism pure and simple; the valuing of one race's blood over all others."

3) "The Zionist barrack in Palestine is about to be destroyed… There is no life, no peace nor hope for the gangs of Zionism to remain in the occupied land."

4) Zionism is "deadly," "corrupt," "demonic" and "defiled." The citizens of Israel are "a people of [concentration] camp wardens."

5) "It is the policies of Israeli governments, especially in the past two decades, that have provoked widespread anti-Jewish feelings in Europe and elsewhere… [Israel] has lost everything in domestic civility and international respectability, and has forfeited the moral high ground forever."

6) Israeli arguments regarding the right to self-defence recall "Hitler's moves to blunt the Czech dagger… Hitler's conceptions have struck a responsive chord in current Zionist commentary… The record of Israeli terrorism goes back to the origins of the state."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

7) "The majority of the Jewish public in Israel (and also out of it) believes that only Jews are human beings, and therefore deserve to be trusted… I am not afraid to say publicly that Israeli Jews, and with them most Jews throughout the world, are undergoing a process of Nazification."

8) "What we are witnessing in the occupied territories – Israel's penal colonies – is the invisible and daily killing of the sick and wounded who are deprived of medical care, of the weak who cannot survive in the new poverty conditions, and of those who are approaching starvation… It is a well calculated strategy of ethnic cleansing."

9) Jews should engage in a public confession for their sins. "The confession has to be public, outside of the synagogue, where all can hear, including Palestinians."

Now, if you guessed that some or all of these statements were made by the president of Iran, the head of Hamas or the leader of Hezbollah, I'm afraid you are looking in the wrong direction.

As Edward Alexander and Paul Bogdanor point out in their devastating compilation of essays titled The Jewish Divide over Israel, all of these quotes are from Jews.

For the record, here's who said what: 1) Prof. Amitai Etzioni (George Washington University); 2) Prof. Michael Neumann (Trent University); 3) Prof. Norman Finkelstein (DePaul University); 4) Prof. Jacqueline Rose (University of London); 5); Prof. Tony Judt (New York University); 6) Prof. Noam Chomsky (MIT); 7) the late Prof. Israel Shahak (Hebrew University; 8) Prof. Tanya Reinhart (Tel Aviv University); 9) Prof. Marc Ellis (Baylor University).

Please spare me the well-worn canard of "legitimate criticism of Israel does not equal anti-Semitism." Can we please be honest, just for a moment, for the sake of our students? There is an element of deep, pathological self-loathing that lies beneath each one of these Jewish lives. Much of the world is only too happy to hypocritically judge Israel. Must we add to their fun?

The Library at Night by Alberto Manguel; Random House.

Nazis destroyed many Jewish libraries

Books
Bernard Baskin

This unusual book is a captivating account of the critical role that libraries have played through the centuries. It is a welcome sequel to his earlier work, A History of Reading (1996), which was a successful melding of scholarship with material devoted to the pleasures of reading and the glory of the written word. This new book is a series of 15 separate essays that approach the subject from different angles.

For Manguel, a library is the "emblem of man's power to act through thought." In a sense, it is a monument intended to defeat death, which is an end to memory.

The author relates that a few years ago at a stand in the Berlin flea market he purchased a Jewish prayer book with no indication of the owner. He surmised that it was probably bought or given to a youth when he became a bar mitzvah and "was permitted to join in synagogue prayer."

Reflecting on the prayer book, the author is prompted to describe how Nazis destroyed Jewish books. Hundreds of Jewish libraries throughout Europe were burned down, both personal collections and public treasure houses.

A Nazi correspondent gleefully reported the destruction of the famous library of the Lublin Yeshiva in 1939: "For us it was a matter of special pride to destroy the Talmudic Academy, which was known as the greatest in Poland... We threw the huge talmudic library out of the building and carried the books to the marketplace, where we set fire to them. The fire lasted 20 hours. The Lublin Jews assembled around and wept bitterly, almost silencing us with their cries. We summoned the military band, and with joyful shouts, the soldiers drowned out the sounds of the Jewish cries."

In 1943, the Nazis established an institution to collect selected Jewish books – the others to be destroyed. Regarding the many Torah scrolls, it was suggested that "perhaps the leather can be preserved to use for bookbinding."

The librarian in charge of the Sholem Aleichem Library in Biala Podlaska, Poland, decided to save the books by carting away, day after day, as many as he and a colleague could manage, even though he believed that very soon "there would be no readers left." After two weeks, the holdings had been moved to a secret attic, where they were discovered long after the war ended. Even if there were no readers, it was an act of piety that the books be preserved.

For Jews to destroy books was an irreparable sin. In eastern Europe, not only were the writers of books exalted, but dealers in books were considered in a special category quite apart from other merchants. A dealer in books was performing a mitzvah because he was spreading Torah and bringing education to others.

In what other culture would one of the greatest writers call himself Mendele Mokher Seforim, Mendele the bookseller? Even the bookbinders held a special position of honour in the community; the great respect for books spilled over a little bit on them.

Readers of The Library at Night will journey into many countries and cultures. They will visit the monumental libraries of the past and discover the influence of books on civilization.

Is blogging a sin?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

What would the Chofetz Chaim make of the World Wide Web?

The Chofetz Chaim, Rabbi Yisrael Meir Kagan (1838-1933) is one of Judaism's greatest proponents of "guarding your tongue," watching what you say and how you say it. Thanks to blogs and social networking sites, the Internet is rife with debate – some of it by writers who are just being cranky; others by people who say blogs are the best way to shine a light on ills that are plaguing a community.

Who is fair game for criticism in a blog? Rabbi Asher Meir of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem says it depends on whether the individual has put himself in the public eye. We "have to make a suitable exception in the case of public figures or aspects of a person's life which are intentionally opened to the public... Blogs are not an appropriate forum for mentioning the virtues and foibles of unassuming people we encounter in everyday life. These people don't seek our praise and are justifiably mortified to be criticized in the public square of cyberspace." [http://tinyurl.com/3dgqk2]

Just ask Tod Goldberg's mother. Goldberg is a (somewhat reformed) blogger who has written about his mother. And he has also written about his mother's reaction when she found out he'd been writing about her. "'You've been saying horrible things about me in your blog,' my mother said. 'How could you?' 'It's my life,' I said, 'I'm allowed to talk about it.' 'But you're not allowed to talk about my life,'" she said. "What if your nana saw these stories?'" Goldberg comes to the conclusion that "Writing in a private journal [like a friends-only MySpace or LiveJournal, for instance, or the paper-and-pen version of old] still counts strictly as lashon hara, because you can't entirely control who reads it. Thinking negative thoughts is one thing, expressing them is where the trouble comes in." [http://tinyurl.com/y8q3lp]

Sometimes blogs go much further than guys writing about their Jewish mothers. It is not difficult to find blogs that accuse rabbis of sexual abuse, as well as blogs that debate whether the Internet is the proper forum for airing these accusations. [http://tinyurl.com/3bz277] At last November's national convention of Agudath Israel of America, Rabbi Matisyahu Salomon of the Beth Medrash Govoha yeshiva in Lakewood, N.J, addressed these issues. About 16 minutes into his 35-minute address, Rabbi Salomon said, "We don't have a tie'na [objection] while people ask questions with derech eretz [respect]. We don't have a tie'na even if people disagree with us with derech eretz. But when it's done in such a sarcastic, cynical, vulgar way in language which belongs to the gutter [and] becomes the language used against [our rabbis, scholars and leaders], then we have to rise to their defence." You can listen to Rabbi Salomon's address in its entirety [http://tinyurl.com/3yd6m3] and read about the continuing controversy as reported by the Baltimore Jewish Times. [http://tinyurl.com/2oa59u]

Jewschool is a popular blog aimed at Jewish youth. The discussion can be lively and thoughtful but can also be personal and insulting. Jewschool founder Daniel Sieradski wrote: "I can't tell you the number of times I, and other contributors to Jewschool, have been deeply hurt by some of the remarks people have made here and elsewhere on the web, when responding to political or religious ideas we've expressed that dissatisfy them." Sieradski's proposal? The Jewish Bloggers Campaign For Responsible Speech Online.

"Ask yourself before posting, 'Is what I've written a kiddush HaShem [a sanctification of God's name] or a chillul HaShem [a desecration of God's name]?' If it's the latter, consider revising your remarks to preserve your point, while minimizing whatever harm you may do to your fellow... This campaign may not save the Jewish world from autocannibalism, but it may make the Jewish blogosphere a more welcoming, informative and enjoyable forum, and perhaps encourage some greater degree of Jewish unity despite the differences between us. B'ezrat HaShem [with the help of God], it shall be so." [http://jewschool.com/?p=9608]

And the official symbol of the Jewish Bloggers Campaign For Responsible Speech Online? A picture of the Chofetz Chaim.

For once, Israel is not blamed

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, the Canadian media paid close attention to the ongoing violence between Hamas and Fatah factions in the Gaza Strip and West Bank. In just four days prior to a Jan. 29 ceasefire, more than two dozen Palestinians were killed and more than 50 were wounded.

On CBC TV's Sunday Night (Jan. 28), Peter Armstrong reported on "the lawlessness in the Palestinian territories, [which are] all but coming apart at the seams. In the Gaza Strip, the situation is even worse [than in the West Bank]. Already marked after months of fighting, Gaza is seething. On these tense streets, people are growing increasingly anxious. The violence is getting worse by the day, and militants have set up checkpoints dividing this city up along factional lines."

That same evening on CTV, Janice Mackey Frayer also reported on the violence: "Thousands of guns are in the hands of rival forces. Some Palestinians say the [civil] war has already started. Hamas has spent its year in power building paramilitary squads that are well-trained, well-armed and believed to be funded by Iran."

In "Saudi offer fails to halt Gaza carnage," (Globe and Mail, Jan. 29), Carolynne Wheeler wrote: "The West Bank and particularly Gaza have plunged into deepening poverty and violence since tens of millions of dollars in foreign aid was cut off to the Palestinian Authority after the election of Hamas a year ago."

She said that that Hamas has rejected the international community's demand that it recognize Israel and renounce violence, and noted that: "Now, reports are emerging of militias stockpiling guns, ammunition and explosives; mortars, grenades and assault rifles are reported to be in use on the streets. Fatah says it has discovered tunnels leading to their leaders' homes in Gaza with the intent of assassination; Hamas says Mr. Abbas's calls for early elections amount to a coup."

What is striking about this reporting is the absence of any accusation that Israel is responsible for this state of affairs. In the past, Israel was often blamed for the failures of internal Palestinian governance. But Palestinians appear to be finally looking inward and examining events in their own society that are unrelated to Israel and to the usual excuse of occupation.

To be sure, the Jan. 29 suicide bombing of an Eilat bakery, in which three Israeli were killed, was justified by Hamas as "resistance to occupation." But journalists understood that the extremists behind the suicide attack were trying to distract attention from internal Palestinian strife by refocusing on their "common enemy," the Israelis.

As the Globe and Mail said in its editorial, "Blowing up a bakery" (Jan. 30): "It is appalling that after an absence of nine months, Palestinian terrorists have chosen to resume the suicide bombing of Israeli civilians. But what takes it into the realm of the absurd is the stated justification for doing so…[t]o send a message of unity to Palestinian factions currently using their weapons on each other."

Michael Bell, former Canadian ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian Authority, as well as Egypt and Jordan, gave a strong endorsement to the new book just out by American-Israeli historian Michael Oren, Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present (in Globe and Mail "Books" Jan. 27).

Calling it "fascinating," Bell wrote that "Oren's history is the essential underpinning of a bold assessment of the roots of U.S. Mideast policy and their profound influence on Washington's policy making today."

Drawing on detailed and little-known scholarship of longstanding American Christian attachment to the idea of "restoration" – the Jews' return to their ancient homeland – Oren provides a timely corrective to noxious ideas being promoted today by the likes of critics such as John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, who argue that U.S. Mideast policy has been hijacked by the powerful pro-Israel lobby contrary to U.S. national interests.

Oren shows how historically America's backing of Israel (and before that, the idea of Israel) is fully consistent with its core values, and he accounts for why today, fully 70 per cent of Americans espouse support for the Jewish state.

MITZVAH KNITTING: Members of Shaar Shalom Synagogue's sisterhood have turned a passion for knitting into an act of tzedakah. Last fall, under the direction of volunteers Janice Schachter and Arna Cappe, experienced and novice knitters began meeting every second Monday. Before long, a group of almost 30 people had run out of wool and was ready to present its first hand-knitted goods to Jewish Family & Child Service for its clients. The group now has 35 knitters and has delivered more than 300 knitted items to JF&CS. Each garment comes with gift card containing a note from the knitter, making it a gift, not a handout. The group is looking for donations of wool and more knitters and crocheters. For details, call Cappe at 905-881-8631 or Shachter at 905-731-0700.

Cemetery had become a 'trash pit'

All Rekanovic was asking for was 2,500 euros, or about $3,800 (Cdn). Granatstein was dismayed at the condition of the small cemetery, which he described as having become a "trash pit" surrounded by homes. Only about a dozen monuments are clearly visible, with others probably sunken, he said.

It had apparently once been enclosed by a stone wall, but only a fragment is left, and there is no sign, and only the Hebrew inscriptions on the grave markers identify that it's Jewish, Granatstein said.

Through a rabbi in Montreal, Granatstein found the president of the 500-member Bosnian Jewish community, in Sarajevo. He met Jacob Finci at the synagogue in that capital city, a seven-hour drive from Bihac.

"He said he'd love to help, but money was an issue," Granatstein said.

He then called his grandparents, Rhoda and Jack Granatstein (not the Canadian military historian of the same name), in Montreal. They were thrilled to pitch in, and about $2,800 was soon raised among family and friends.

Then Granatstein's commanders, Maj. Josip Zunic and Capt. James Houlihan, met with Hamdija Lipovaca, the mayor of Bihac, a town of less than 30,000, who agreed that this was an important project. He offered to match the amount that Granatstein had raised and pledged to look after the cemetery indefinitely.

Granatstein a reservist in the 712 Communication Squadron for almost four years

Again, Granatstein was bowled over.

"Here were people going out of their way to give to a Jewish cemetery when there wasn't even a Jewish community anymore."

The money is enough to put up a basic fence and a plaque, as well as clean out the cemetery and keep the grass cut.

Through an Israeli organization, Granatstein found out that it is the Beth Olam cemetery and that it goes back about 200 years. A lot more work could be done to restore the monuments, but Granatstein feels good about what has been achieved. A contractor was expected to be hired this week and work to begin shortly.

"I would not have been able to do this without the help of Maj. Zunic and Capt. Houlihan and the 10 other Canadians. I had their full support," he said.

He also gives much credit to his interpreter, Lorena Agic, who accompanies him wherever he goes and went well beyond her official duties to help him.

Before World War II, about 14,000 Jews lived in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the Jewish presence there dates back to the Spanish Inquisition. During the war, the area was controlled by the pro-Nazi Croatian Ustace government. Only 4,000 Jews are believed to have survived the 1941 deportations and executions, carried out, according to some sources, with Bosnia Muslim collaborators.

After the 1991 Yugoslav civil war broke out, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee airlifted more than 2,000 Jews from Bosnia to Israel, where most remained.

Granatstein, a McGill University graduate who has been a reservist in the 712 Communication Squadron for almost four years, expects to return to Montreal in March or April and soon after to return to law school at the Université de Montréal.

He took a year off his studies to train and serve in Bosnia, his first overseas assignment. Serving in the military is something he said he has always wanted to do, especially in a peacekeeping role. "Before that I had worked in retail for four years, but I thought there must be something bigger to do than selling clothes."

There is no fighting anymore in Bosnia, although the political situation is quite unstable and there are ethnic tensions, he said. The biggest risk to the forces are the 700,000 to 800,000 land mines that still dot the region.

"It can be pretty scary when you're driving down the road, and know from your map that there are mines on either side."

Although much of the region has been rebuilt, there is still plenty of destruction that serves as a reminder that it was a battlefield not long ago.

Crime and traffic accidents also pose a danger.

Granatstein is armed about half the time, but he has never had to draw, let alone fire, a weapon. "And I hope I never have to."

He said the people are very welcoming and open to the foreign troops.

"It's an amazing experience. I love my job. I get paid to drive around and talk to people and come up with solutions to problems."

He spent his first Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur away from home, working as usual. His recent visit with the Jewish community in Sarajevo was especially gratifying. "They treated me like family that had never left. It was a pretty powerful experience."

Granatstein lives in a compound with the other Canadians and has his own converted shipping container to live in. "After sleeping in a hole in the ground for a week during basic training, it's really quite luxurious," he said.

France not obsessed with ethnicity, French beauty queen says

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Alexandra Rosenfeld is the embodiment of French elegance.

In October, the 20-year-old blonde with the radiant smile and lilting voice was crowned Miss Europe at a competition in Kiev, where she was chosen over 37 European beauty queens. Prior to that, she was Miss France 2006.

Her life as a tourism student has been turned upside down since she was crowned Miss France 14 months ago.

"The life I'm living seems like a fairy tale. I never dreamed of becoming Miss France, much less Miss Europe. I entered the first contest on a whim, because some friends encouraged me to. I honestly didn't expect to win. Then there was Miss Europe, where all the candidates were very lovely. I don't know what made the difference," Rosenfeld told The Canadian Jewish News in a recent interview.

A native of Saint-Thibéry, a small village of 2,300 in southern France, Rosenfeld was born to a Jewish father and a Catholic mother. Although she does not practise Judaism, she is aware of the fact that she is considered Jewish. However, she was reluctant to discuss her Jewish roots. "It's not like a sign I have to wear on my forehead," she said.

For Rosenfeld, whose father had family members who were exterminated in Auschwitz, Judaism means "sharing a common memory, history and destiny."

"The Holocaust is an unspeakable tragedy in which some 80,000 French Jews perished," she says. "That human massacre should not be of concern only to Jews, but to all human beings. We must be very vigilant because Holocaust deniers have been gaining strength."

Rosenfeld is worried about the increase in anti-Semitism France has experienced in recent years.

"Anti-Semitism and racism are despicable plagues. We must do everything we can to vigorously fight these hideous monsters."

Last year, she participated in a large demonstration organized in Paris to denounce the murder of a young French Jew, Ilan Halimi.

"My presence at the demonstration was not orchestrated by the Miss France contest organizers to give me publicity, as some malicious gossips suggested. I was the one who decided to participate in that rally, because I have a heart. It had nothing to do with whether I am Jewish or not. It's true that as a Jew, as a Frenchwoman and as a human being, I was horrified by the assassination of Ilan Halimi, as were several million of my fellow citizens. It's shameful that such a barbarous act should be perpetrated in a great, civilized democracy like France."

A few days after Rosenfeld was chosen Miss France, several English-language newspapers wrote that the Internet site and blog of the contest organizers had received many complaints from French people who were unhappy that a Jew had been crowned Miss France. Rosenfeld says that is "absolutely untrue.

"To denounce and denigrate France, some newspapers, notably English-language ones, don't hesitate to write whatever they want – even lies."

She admits that there is anti-Semitism and racism in France.

"But name one country where there is no xenophobia. Miss France is a beauty contest and not a contest of ethnicity. Whether you are Jewish, Asian, black… it's not important," she insists. "The only thing that is taken into consideration is the beauty and the personality of the candidates. Previous winners have been of North African, Martinican and Rwandan origin… I don't think I am the first Frenchwoman of Jewish origin to have won this contest."

Alexandra Rosenfeld

Despite what some people think and say, the French are not obsessed with ethnicity, she stresses.

"What matters is competence and excellence. The French football team is the most obvious proof of the multi-ethnic and multi-coloured France of today. What counts in the Miss France contest is not religion or ethnic origin, but beauty."

What has she learned from her experiences since becoming Miss France?

"What I realize the most is that I have matured. I was very protected by my parents, and suddenly I found myself alone in Paris. I have always been timid and very reserved. But once you start to give interviews all the time, you develop confidence and learn to speak with people you don't know. It's good preparation for a future career."

As for her own plans, Rosenfeld is determined to become a sports journalist.

"Journalism, writing and sports have fascinated me for a long time," she says.

What advice would she give to someone who wants to enter a beauty contest?

"If she has the opportunity to enter a beauty contest and win, she should continue to be herself from beginning to end. And above all, she should stay in contact with her family and her parents because they are irreplaceable," Rosenfeld says.

Cantor Bagley left legacy of music and students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor David Bagley died Jan. 27 at North York General Hospital, leaving a legacy of his own musical compositions, and dozens of former students. He was 74.

David Bagley

Bagley suffered a stroke seven years ago, which led to his semi-retirement from Beth Radom Congregation, where he served as cantor and rabbi beginning in 1996. A setback about two years after the initial stroke triggered a lengthy bout of health challenges, and he spent most of his last years at Baycrest.

Bagley had an international career as a synagogue cantor that took him to Mexico, Israel and South Africa, where he was affiliated with the Oxford Synagogue in Johannesburg.

He also served at Montreal's Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob, and at Toronto's Beth Sholom Congregation, where his funeral was held. He served two stints at Beth Sholom – for a total of about 15 years, his longest time at any congregation.

A native of Vilna, Bagley escaped Europe with his family as a child. At the beginning of World War II, they fled to Japan and then Shanghai, China, where he studied at the Mir Yeshivah. He obtained smichah at Yeshiva Beth Yosef Novardok in Brooklyn at the age of 19.

A self-described traditionalist, Bagley's career included cantorial concerts and recordings. He was also a past president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim.

Toronto lawyer Noam Goodman, a former student of Bagley's who took over some of his duties at Beth Radom when Bagley suffered his first stroke, remembers the cantor as a teacher who "cared a lot for his students" and was very giving with his time.

"He used to say, 'Remember that you're not davening; you're speaking to God.' That was how he approached his duties as a cantor. You could feel that every word had emotion, and there was meaning behind every word he was saying."

On a personal note, Bagley's son Yaakov said in a eulogy that his father's greatest gift was his ability "to treat all people equally, no matter what their background or level of knowledge was. To him a Jew was a Jew."

He noted that Bagley was mentally alert until two months before his death. When one of his six grandchildren practised his bar mitzvah portion with him a little over a year ago, Bagley corrected him on the words and the trope.

"It's the end of an era," said Beth Sholom's Cantor Eric Moses, president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, who remembers Bagley for "his understanding of the cantorial art, of nusach hatfillah, and his devotion to prayer and to a real Jewish way of life."

Bagley leaves his wife Klara, sons Yaakov of Cherry Hill, N.J.; Moshe of Queens, N.Y.; and Tzvi, of Long Island, N.Y.; his brother Joel, of Miami; and sisters Yocheved Anemer, of Silver Spring, Md., and Libby Mines, of Queens.

JVS psychologist an inspired leader ahead of her time

'Devoted her life to the study of the human mind'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ruth Borchiver, a JVS psychologist for 40 years who died suddenly of a stroke on Jan. 27 at age 78, is remembered for being an inspired leader who was ahead of her time.

"With her standards of excellence and her commitment [to the field], Ruth was singularly responsible for attracting me to the agency," said Karen Goldenberg, JVS president and CEO.

Borchiver, born and raised in Toronto, was JVS chief psychologist when she retired two years ago.

She received her master's degree in 1952, her certification as a registered psychologist in 1965 and her doctorate in applied psychology in 1991.

She served on the Tikun Chaim advisory committee of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and was a member of the Association of Chief Psychologists, the Council for Exceptional Children and the Association of School Psychologists.

Shortly after she joined JVS as a career and rehabilitation counsellor in 1964, JVS was given funds by the predecessor of UJA Federation to provide educational services to one Jewish day school, with Borchiver as consultant.

Currently, JVS serves about 6,000 students in 12 schools on 21 campuses.

"My mother was one of the most interesting women I have ever known," said her son Richard in a eulogy.

"There was Dr. Ruth, the innovative and progressive-minded psychologist who devoted her life to the study of the human mind. Then there was our mother who embraced so many of the stereotypes of the proverbial Jewish mother that it often left me wondering who the real Ruth was."

Growing up in Kensington Market, Richard said, Borchiver's first language was Yiddish, and as she grew older, she was often called upon to recite poetry in Yiddish to large gatherings of people.

"I remember her telling me that her proudest moment was when World War II came to an end, and she was asked to read Ich bin a yid to the large crowd that gathered downtown."

Although many women of her generation did not attend university, her son said, she was pressured by her mother to do so, and after graduation "she embarked on a career that I could not possibly do justice to in a few minutes."

Ruth Borchiver

When he was a child, he said, "[many of my contemporaries] would ask me if my mother was a psychologist. When I answered 'yes,' they often told me that [she] had tested them or intervened on their behalf with the school or their parents.

"Unless they told me this, I would never have known anything because my mother guarded the client privilege relationship very seriously."

Ilana Blidner, Ruth's granddaughter, called her grandmother a trailblazer for obtaining a master's degree at a time when most women did not have careers outside of the home.

"To most, retirement means no more work, creating new hobbies, and relaxing from a long hard life. To my bubbie, it meant gaining certification in cognitive behavioural therapy, opening her own practice and seeing clients in her home."

At the same time, she said, "Bubbie and Zaidie began a new life together. In the last two years, they have travelled to places I dream of going... Whose grandparents go travelling throughout China and other southeast Asian countries? Whose bubbie goes to pilates four days a week and is better dressed than her 20-year-old granddaughters?"

It was her grandmother's duty, "to make sure each [of the grandchildren] felt happy, settled and comfortable in our various life experiences," she said.

"If she noticed any facial expression of ours that indicated otherwise, she would internalize our emotions, display a concerned expression, and walk around the house conflicted. Our problems immediately became her problems."

Mark Borchiver, Ruth's son, said that he not only lost his mother, he lost a friend. "Not just any friend... and not just the best of friends, but the kind of rare friend that felt my joy, my pain, my struggles and triumphs more acutely than I ever could."

Borchiver, whose daughter Joan Blidner died nine years ago, also leaves daughters-in-law Elaine Borchiver and Marilyn Demone and son-in-law Mark; grandchildren Dov, Rebecca, Jessica, Erica, and Dale; and step-grandchildren Daniel, Emily, Yael and Avital.

Memorial donations may be made to the Ruth Borchiver and Joan Blidner fund care of JVS, 416-787-1151.

Entering recipe contests can be fun and profitable

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many companies run cooking contests to promote their products, with prizes being offered for the best recipes. There are cooking contests for everything from the ridiculous (a pickled beets cooking contest) to the sublime (national beef cooking contests and bake-offs). In the United States, even a kosher chicken processing company runs a cooking contest. Prizes can be anything from a set of pans or knives to free trips, appliances and the grand prize of all – $1 million (US) in the most famous bake-off contest.

With the exception of small local contests, the process for selecting winners is generally the same. In large contests, thousands of entries are narrowed down by professionals to about 100, and then winnowed down to about 25. The recipes are tested by home economists to ensure that they'll work consistently in home kitchens. The top entrants are then notified and in some cases, invited to the competition to prepare their recipes in person. The winner is usually declared with much fanfare and publicity.

Here is a sampling of recipes that have won national cooking contests in the United States. Most of them were chosen over thousands of other recipes so you know they'll be good.

MUSHROOM AND CHICKEN LOAF

This winner is a dish your family will love for a weeknight supper.

4 tbsp. olive oil
4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1 package white mushrooms, sliced
¼ cup lemon juice
2 tbsp. garlic
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 loaf Italian bread (not sliced)

In a large frying pan, heat 2 tbsp. oil. Place chicken in pan and brown on both sides. Add lemon juice, ½ tsp. salt and ½ tsp. pepper to chicken while browning. Remove chicken from pan, cut into small pieces and and set aside.

Place remaining oil in pan and heat. Saute mushrooms and garlic with remaining salt and pepper. Return chicken to pan and heat through.

Cut top of Italian bread down middle and take the inside out. Place chicken and mushroom mixture inside of bread and put top back on. Cover with aluminum foil and bake in oven at 350 for 10 to 15 minutes to heat bread. Uncover and put on a platter. To serve, slice bread, and serve two slices to each person. Makes 6-8 servings.

CUMIN-CRUSTED BEEF STEAKS WITH ORANGE-OLIVE RELISH

When you read the title or list of ingredients in this recipe, it may sound strange, but it's delicious. This six-ingredient dish (other than salt and pepper) blends cumin, oranges, olives and chuck steak that takes only 30 minutes to cook and proved to be a winner for its creator. It won top honours over 5,000 other entrants in a national beef cook-off and won the $50,000 grand prize.

4 boneless beef chuck eye or chuck top blade steaks, cut ¾-inch thick (about 1½ lb.)
2 to 3 medium oranges
1½ tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
7-oz. jar roasted red peppers, diced
⅓ cup coarsely chopped Kalamata olives
¼ cup diced red onion

Pecan sandies as seen in kosher by design short on time by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications.

Scrub oranges and grate 2 tsp. orange peel from oranges; reserve oranges. Combine orange peel, cumin and salt in small bowl; remove and reserve 2 tsp. of this seasoning for relish.

Heat ridged grill pan or large nonstick skillet over medium heat until hot. Add pepper to remaining seasoning; press evenly onto beef steaks.

Place steaks in grill pan; cook chuck eye steaks 9 to 11 minutes for medium-rare to medium doneness, turning once.

Meanwhile, peel and dice enough reserved oranges to measure 1½ cups. Combine diced oranges, red peppers, olives, onion and reserved 2 tsp. seasoning in medium bowl; mix well. Serve steaks with this relish. Garnish with orange slices and olives. Makes 4 servings.

FROSTED BANANA COOKIES

Use up those overripe bananas in this delicious drop cookie that is based on a great American family cookie swap winner.

¾ cup firmly packed brown sugar
¾ cup butter or margarine
2 medium (⅔ cup) ripe bananas, mashed
1 egg
2 tsp. grated orange peel
½ tsp. vanilla
2 cups all-purpose flour
½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt

Glaze Ingredients:
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
3 tbsp. firmly packed brown sugar
3 tbsp. whipping cream or orange juice
1 cup powdered sugar
½ tsp. vanilla

Heat oven to 350. Combine ¾ cup brown sugar and ¼ cup butter or margarine in large mixer bowl. Beat at medium speed, scraping bowl often, until creamy (1 to 2 minutes). Add bananas, egg, orange peel and ½ tsp. vanilla; continue beating until well mixed (1 to 2 minutes).

Reduce speed to low; add flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Beat until well mixed (1 to 2 minutes).

Drop dough by rounded tsp. 2 in. apart onto ungreased cookie sheets. Bake for 8 to 10 minutes or until edges are lightly browned. Cool completely.

Melt 2 tbsp. butter or margarine in a 1-qt.saucepan over medium heat. Add 3 tbsp. brown sugar and whipping cream or orange juice. Continue cooking, stirring occasionally, until mixture comes to a boil (1 to 2 minutes). Remove from heat. Add powdered sugar and ½ tsp. vanilla; beat until well mixed (1 to 2 minutes). Frost cooled cookies. After beating in powdered sugar, let cool to desired spreading consistency (5 to 10 minutes). Makes 48 cookies.

TUNNEL OF FUDGE CAKE

This is the most famous cake ever to win a recipe contest – a grand prize winner in the Pillsbury bake-off. It is a rich chocolate tube cake with a "tunnel of creamy fudge" inside. It's fabulous!

1¾ cups sugar
1¾ cups margarine or butter, softened
6 eggs
2 cups powdered sugar
2¼ cups flour
¾ cup unsweetened cocoa
2 cups chopped walnuts*

Glaze
¾ cup powdered sugar
¼ cup unsweetened cocoa
4 to 6 tsp. milk or water

Heat oven to 350. Grease and flour 12-cup bundt pan or 10-in. tube pan. Or spray with non-stick cooking spray. In large bowl of mixer, combine sugar and margarine; beat until light and fluffy. Add eggs 1 at a time, beating well after each addition. Gradually add 2 cups powdered sugar; blend well. By hand, stir in flour and remaining cake ingredients until well blended. Spoon batter into greased and floured pan; spread evenly.

Bake at 350 for 45 to 50 minutes or until top is set and edges are beginning to pull away from sides of pan. Cool upright in pan on wire rack 1½ hours. Invert onto serving plate; cool at least 2 hours.

In small bowl, combine all glaze ingredients, adding enough liquid for desired drizzling consistency. Spoon over top of cake, allowing some to run down sides. Store tightly covered.

* Nuts are essential for the success of this recipe.

 Since this cake has a soft filling, an ordinary doneness test cannot be used. Accurate oven temperature and baking times are essential.

נדמה שעוד לא היתה תקופה בתולדות המדינה שבה כל כך הרבה פוליטיקאים ואנשי ציבור נחקרו חקירה פלילית והועמדו למשפט. שאלת השאלות, שאין עליה תשובה פשוטה היא האם הדבר מסמל עלייה בשחיתות, או עלייה במאמצי המשטרה והפרקליטות לגלות אותה. משום מה יש לי הרגשה שהאפשרות השניה היא הנכונה, וכראייה חלקית-יותר מפעם אחת טענו פוליטיקאים לאחרונה שמאשימים אותם בדברים (כמו העדפת קרובים למשרות ממלכתיות), שהיו נורמות מקובלות במשך עשרות שנים. ומן הראוי גם לשים לב שבתיקים רבים מסתיימת המהומה ללא הוכחות וללא הרשעה, מה שמרמז שאולי גם משטרת ישראל איננה תמיד ברמה מקצועית מי יודע מה, וההתלהמות שלה לא תמיד מספיקה להוכיח את פשעו של הפוליטיקאי בבית המשפט, אך בהחלט מספיקה להרוס את חייו.

לא ברור לי מדוע ירצה איזשהו אדם שפוי לעסוק בפוליטיקה במדינה שבה כל ראשי הממשלה של עשר השנים האחרונות (נתניהו, ברק, שרון, אולמרט) בילו חלק ניכר מתקופת כהונתם בנסיונות להגן על שמם ומשפחתם. משהו דפוק שם לחלוטין, אבל שישאר ביניינו.

Soups from different tables illustrate Israel's ethnic diversity

By DANIEL ROGOV
IPS

With a population that has immigrants from more than 80 different nations, it should come as no surprise that Israel has not developed a cuisine uniquely its own. That is not a fault, however, for the Israeli table, both in private homes and in the many restaurants throughout the country, is comfortably set with dishes from many different regions and peoples.

In no case is there greater ethnic diversity in culinary offerings than in soups which, it must be understood, have a special meaning in Israeli life. It is often with this dish that we greet guests and welcome them to our homes. It is with soup that one "breaks bread" – and as in biblical days, bread is quite literally "broken" or torn apart, not sliced. The soup is usually brought to the table in a communal pot or dish rather than in individual bowls.

Modern-day Israelis of all ethnic backgrounds have never lost their love of soup. Following are several recipes, each from a different land, which continue to maintain their popularity throughout the country today. The recipes are designed to serve 4 to 6.

FOOT SOUP – YEMEN

1 calf's foot, split by the butcher
1½ litres (about 6½ cups) water or chicken stock
1 whole onion, peeled
2 sprigs fresh thyme
1 bay leaf
6 whole black peppercorns
salt and pepper as required
2-3 coriander leaves, chopped finely
1 hot red pepper, with seeds removed, chopped finely
2-3 strips lemon rind
egg yolks and water as required

Wash and clean the foot thoroughly. Place the two halves in a large saucepan, pour over the water or stock, add the whole onion, thyme, bay leaf and peppercorns and heat just to the simmering point. Cover and let simmer gently for 3 hours.

Strain the mixture through a colander into a clean saucepan. Discard the peppercorns and bay leaf and when the foot is cool enough to handle remove the meat with a knife and return the meat to the liquids. When the mixture is completely cool skim off the excess fat from the surface of the soup.

Correct the seasoning with salt and pepper and then add the coriander leaves, lemon rind and chopped hot pepper. Heat through.

For every cup of soup allow 1 egg yolk and 4 tbsp. of cold water. Beat these together.

Remove the lemon rind, beat 1 tbsp. of the egg yolk and water mixture into the soup and then fold the rest of the mixture into the soup, stirring constantly over a very low heat just until the soup begins to thicken. Do not allow the soup to boil again as this would cause the eggs to curdle. Serve hot, ideally accompanied by a zhug (hot spicy sauce) mixture in a separate bowl so that diners can stir as little or as much as they like into their soup.

SPINACH SOUP – ROMANIA

½ kilo (about 1 lb.) spinach
3 tbsp. butter
3 eggs
juice of 1 large lemon
salt and pepper to taste
7 cups chicken or vegetable stock
1 cup croutons
½ cup grated Parmesan cheese

Remove the heavy stems from the spinach and wash well under running water. Dry the leaves on paper towels. In a heavy skillet, melt the butter and sauté the spinach leaves until just tender.

In a saucepan, bring the stock just to the point of boiling. Reduce the flame and let simmer gently for 4-5 minutes. In a small mixing bowl, beat together the eggs, lemon juice, salt and pepper. Add 3 tbsp. of the hot stock and beat well. Add this mixture to the stock and then add the spinach. Mix briskly, garnish with the cheese and croutons. Serve hot.

SAUERKRAUT SOUP – RUSSIA

½ kilo (about 1 lb.) sauerkraut
1½ tbsp. pareve margarine
1½ tbsp. vegetable oil
2 large onions, chopped coarsely
1 stalk celery, diced
2½ litres (about 10 cups) hot beef stock
1 kilo (about 2 lb.) lean beef, cut into cubes or 10 sliced frankfurters
1 bouquet garni made by tying 1 bay leaf, 8 peppercorns and 1 sprig of thyme in a cheesecloth
salt and pepper to taste
8 small potatoes, boiled in their skins
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill or 1 ybsp. dried dill

Black-bean soup as seen in kosher by design short on time by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications.

Rinse the sauerkraut in cold water and drain thoroughly. In a large saucepan heat the margarine and oil together and gently sauté the onions and celery until the onions begin to turn golden. Add the stock, meat and bouquet garni and simmer very gently, uncovered, for 2 hours. Discard the bouquet garni, correct the seasoning and serve with the whole, peeled potatoes and dill.

CINNAMON WINE SOUP – TURKEY

3 cups dry red wine
3 tbsp. cornstarch
3 cups plus 3 tbsp. water, divided
3 tbsp. sugar
2 egg yolks, beaten lightly
1 stick cinnamon, about 3 in. long peel of ½ lemon

In a saucepan, simmer the wine, cinnamon and lemon peel for 10 minutes.

In a mixing bowl, blend together the cornstarch and 3 tbsp. of cold water. Into this stir 3 cups of water, transfer to a separate saucepan and simmer gently for 5 minutes.

Strain the cornstarch mixture into the wine and add the sugar, stirring well (add more sugar to taste if desired).

Slowly spoon about 1 cup of the hot wine soup into the egg yolks, beating constantly. Pour the mixture back into the soup slowly, beating constantly. Heat through but do not boil.

Taste and correct the seasoning with sugar if necessary. May be served hot or chilled.

BEAN SOUP – GREECE (FASSOULADHA)

2½ cups dried lima beans
½ cup olive oil
2 medium onions, chopped finely
2 medium carrots, chopped
½ cup celery, chopped
1-2 cloves garlic, chopped finely
1 cup tomatoes, peeled and chopped
1 tbsp. tomato puree
½ tsp. each salt, sugar and pepper
4 cups chicken stock
3 tbsp. parsley, chopped

Place the beans in a mixing bowl and pour 4 cups of cold water over them. Cover and soak overnight.

In a large saucepan, heat the oil and sauté the onion, carrots, celery and garlic until the onions are translucent. Add the tomatoes, tomato puree, salt, pepper and sugar. Cover and simmer on a medium low flame for about 10 minutes. Add the beans, stock and the water in which the beans were soaked.

Cover and continue to simmer gently for an additional 2 hours.

Add 1 tbsp. of the parsley and cook until the beans are tender (about 45 minutes). Sprinkle with the remaining parsley and serve hot.

PECAN SOUP – EGYPT

1 cup pecans, chopped finely
1 cup milk
½ cup breadcrumbs
2 tbsp. flour
2 tbsp. butter
3 cups vegetable stock
¼ tsp. mace
⅓ cup light cream
¼ cup finely chopped parsley
salt and pepper to taste

Put the pecans, milk, breadcrumbs and flour into a saucepan and bring just to the point of boiling, stirring constantly.

Remove immediately from the flame. In a large saucepan melt the butter and stir in the milk mixture. Slowly blend in the stock and mace. Bring to a boil and immediately lower the flame and simmer gently for 5 minutes. Stir in the cream, salt and pepper, pour into individual serving bowls and garnish with parsley. Serve hot.

Mutual love gives couple 75 years together

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jack Cohen has the proof at the ready: a neatly folded piece of paper – a ketubah – bearing the letterhead of the Jubilee Street Zionist Great Synagogue in London, England, with his and his bride Betty Haskal's names, duly dated Jan. 26, 1932.

Tangible evidence is almost needed to believe that Jack and Betty, who are so full of life, are 97 and 96, respectively, and that they have managed to stay very much in love for three-quarters of a century.

"There's no secret," Jack says. "Just mutual love, compromise and never go to bed with a problem unresolved."

Betty adds, "You need a lot of understanding."

"And always have the last word – 'Yes, dear,'" Jack says, and they both laugh.

They still hold hands and share a double bed. In fact, they recently bought a new one.

"We've been together 24/7 since 1955," the ebullient Jack says proudly. That's when they opened Conway Shoes on Somerled Avenue in NDG, where they worked together until retiring in 1975.

"We're a unit. We're nothing without each other," he said.

They are so attuned that, "We can sit hours and not say a word, and then we come out with the same thought. It's sort of ESP," he says.

He thinks their longevity may have a lot to do with their harmonious and close-knit family life. They say their two daughters, Rita Lewis and Carol Obront, never gave them a moment's aggravation, and they have a deep attachment to their husbands and their families. "Our sons-in-law have been as good to us as any son of our own could be. They're both loving, caring people," Jack said.

The Cohens have six grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren, aged 7 to 22. All attended the couple's diamond anniversary celebration last week, many coming from out of town.

Betty and Jack were teenaged sweethearts, introduced at a wedding. Their memories are so sharp they remember that night like it was last year. Jack was captivated by Betty's green-eyed beauty and still is, he says, gazing at her admiringly. Betty, the more reserved one, remembers being attracted to Jack's outgoing personality.

Jack and Betty Cohen have been married for three-quarters of a century.

Within three months they were engaged, and 2½ years later married, after Jack had established himself as a furrier. They were both born in London into secular, middle-class families. Their parents were Romanian immigrants.

The synagogue where they wed in London's east end is no longer there. "It's a mosque now," said Jack.

They emigrated to Montreal in 1952, fleeing Britain's postwar recession. Montreal was then the centre of Canada's fur industry and Jack was confident he would fare better here.

On the ship over, he met by chance a partner with Grosvenor furs who offered him a job. "We landed on a Tuesday, and I was at work on Wednesday."

Betty admits she found the transition difficult: the first couple of years were lonely, and she longed to return to England. Rita, who was born in December 1932 was working, and Carol born in 1940 was in school.

Things changed when Rita soon met her husband-to-be, the lively Freddy Lewis, a union that expanded the Cohens' world. Lewis was in the shoe business and convinced his in-laws to open a shoe store.

Rita now lives in St. Sauveur and Carol has lived for many years in Toronto, with husband Seymore. Betty speaks to them twice a day.

"When she first moved away, I would sometimes say to Jack, when we closed the store on Saturday at 6, 'I've got to see Carol.' We would get into Toronto at midnight, and return on Sunday and be back at the store on Monday.

"Every [other] Sunday, and I mean every Sunday, whatever the weather, we used to spend with Rita," she said.

The Cohens have lived since August at the Manoir Montefiore, an assisted-living residence in Cote St. Luc, reluctantly giving up their independence and their NDG apartment, where they had resided since 1962.

Betty, a great cook, was finding it harder and harder to stand because of a spinal problem and could no longer make dinner every night, as she had until then.

But the biggest blow was the loss of Jack's driver's license on his 97th birthday, Aug. 17. The reason was simply age, he said. "I never had an accident." That meant no longer being able to pick up the groceries – or going for the drives that were their favourite pastime.

Betty never drove, "but I used to tell him where to go," she jokes.

It's also the first winter in 31 years that they have not spent in Florida, where they have a place.

"The amenities are very good," Jack says of their new home. "But the environment is very sad. Fifty per cent [of the residents] use walkers, 25 per cent are in wheelchairs and the others have to be held by the hand. They don't know what floor they are on."

In short, the neighbours are too old.

Betty and Jack keep up with the news, watching mostly CNN and PBS. They marvel at new technology – the Internet, cellphones, miniature music players. They wish there were other residents they could have a meaningful conversation with.

They eat dinner in the Manoir's dining room, but he prepares breakfast and she makes lunch.

They were wonderful ballroom dancers, especially the foxtrot. They fondly remember the dance halls of their youth. Over the years, they won a few contests and kept it up until their legs wouldn't allow them to go on.

Jack's mobility is also now limited. "It's the circulation. If I was younger, they probably would have done a bypass."

Despite not getting around as well as he once did, Jack performed in a play at the Montefiore recently, enjoying his first time "on stage."

> They were wonderful ballroom dancers, especially the foxtrot

"When I hear music, my feet still start tapping," said Betty. "I wish I could take just two steps."

Having always been so active, her lack of mobility is especially frustrating. "I see the IGA across the street and I just wish I could go over to it. I never thought it would happen to me. Sometimes I dream that I'm walking."

There's a walker in the closet, but it's regarded much like the proverbial skeleton, something that is not to be talked about, Jack confides.

A shuttle bus does take them to the mall once a week, and she manages to get around the aisles by holding onto the cart.

Betty and Jack travelled a good deal, visiting over 30 countries. "My husband and I have travelled extensively with them, and they always put us to bed and went in search of more activities when we were ready to sleep," daughter Carol says.

Jack is still making plans. "When I turned 90 in 1999, I said my wish was to see the 21st century. Now I'm going for the century – 2½ years," he said.

And Betty plans to be with him.

Iran seeks 'nuclear ambiguity': TAU report

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — A new study on Iran and its nuclear program suggests that Tehran "is seeking to adopt a policy of nuclear ambiguity."

The study, authored by Ephraim Kam and a team of researchers at the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University, was to be presented this week at a conference on Iran's nuclear program, its implications and options for dealing with it.

According to the study, as Iran formulates its nuclear policy, it will have to decide on one of three options: a) to remain on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons – to avoid developing a nuclear arsenal immediately, but developing the capability to do so on short notice; b) to adopt a policy of nuclear ambiguity – to produce nuclear weapons, but to avoid making their existence public and testing them, in the hope of averting further pressure on Tehran; and c) to produce nuclear weapons, announce their existence and possibly also to carry out a test.

The study suggests that Iran will prefer the second option "which appears most likely, at least in the first stage."

The third option is the "most problematic one for Iran," say the researchers. The tendency of the regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to challenge the international community and establish facts on the ground in nuclear matters, while ignoring international public opinion, and the chance that Iran could be influenced by the North Korean example, may, however, lead to the last, more threatening possibility.

The study also evaluates the chances that a military operation may be undertaken against Iran's nuclear installations and concludes that "this is a very problematic and complex operation that involves many risks, including an open-ended Iranian response. Moreover, a military operation is not guaranteed. At this stage the political conditions are also not ripe for an operation, so long as the diplomatic efforts continue."

'Likely to act logically'

Nonetheless, the report notes that the military option is important and preparations for it should continue because of the pressure it places on Tehran, "in view of the fact that the two states that do not reject this option are the U.S. and Israel."

The report also notes that a nuclear-armed Iran has serious implications for Israel because "for the first time an enemy state will have the technical capability of striking a mortal blow against Israel, particularly in view of the Iranian regime's specific call for the destruction of Israel. In essence, this combination holds an existential threat for Israel."

However, the report states that it must be assumed that a nuclear Iran will act logically, rationally evaluating the price and risks involved in its actions, and will not act out of religious-ideological motives. If one makes this assumption, then one appreciates that Iran's motives for acquiring nuclear weapons "are defensive, [and are to be used] against Iraq in the past and against the U.S. today."

Such an explanation can be added to Iran's strategic goals of achieving regional hegemony and to bolster the domestic position of the Iranian regime.

"It is reasonable to assume that also in the future Iran will opt to retain this type of weapons as a final card to use against extreme threats, and that the elimination of Israel is not considered to be an essential interest worthy of using such weapons."

The report also assumes that the likelihood that Iran will transfer nuclear arms to terrorist organizations is minimal.

For Israel, the study's advice is to bolster its means of deterrence. Among other measures, this includes sending a clear and convincing message that if Israel is attacked by nuclear weapons, it will still retain a counter-strike capability "with severe consequences." In addition, emphasis should be placed on the likelihood that a nuclear strike against Israel may fail because of the performance of the Arrow anti-ballistic missile system, which is one of the elements that are meant to ensure that Israel can mount a counter-strike if necessary.

In other Iran-related news, Tehran is reportedly expanding its air force's capability for long-range bombing runs.

In a recent exposé, Jane's Defense Weekly reported that the Iranian air force has been practising aerial refuelling so that its warplanes can deliver heavy ordnances – potentially with nuclear warheads – at greater ranges in case of war with Israel or the United States.

According to Jane's, the recent defense pact between Tehran and Damascus means that Iranian planes can use Syrian airspace for training. An enhanced aerial capability would boost Iran's strategic threat to Israeli and U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf. Israel's main concern now is Iran's Shihab ballistic missiles, while Washington is watching Iran's increasingly aggressive naval operations in the Gulf.

Israel 'playing with fire' in mosque dig, Meshal says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DAMASCUS — The leader of Hamas has condemned excavations by Israeli archeologists near Jerusalem's Al-Aqsa Mosque and warned they were "playing with fire."

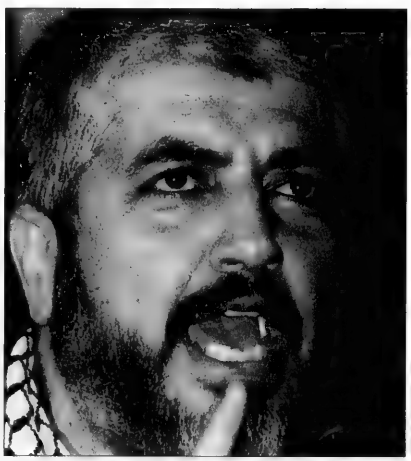
"I have a stern warning for the enemy," Khaled Meshal said at a news conference Sunday in the Syrian capital.

"[Ariel] Sharon's desecration of the Aqsa sparked the 2000 uprising," Meshal added. "The Israeli leadership must learn from this lesson. We have confidence in our people, its masses, all of its groups and military wings."

A Palestinian uprising erupted in September 2000 after a visit, condemned in the Arab world, by Sharon, then Israel's opposition leader, to the mosque compound in east Jerusalem, which Israel occupied and annexed after the 1967 Arab-Israeli war in a move not recognized internationally.

"Israel knows what its violation of the holy Aqsa will bring. It is playing with fire," Meshal said.

The Al-Aqsa and Dome of the Rock mosques sit above the Western Wall in an area referred to by Jews as the Temple Mount and Muslims as the al-Haram al-Sherif. The Al-Aqsa Mosque is Islam's third holiest shrine and has been a flashpoint for Israeli-Palestinian fighting in the past.



Khaled Meshal

In the 1980s, Israel uncovered a plot by a group of Jews to blow up the mosque in the hope that a new Jewish temple could be built at the site.

Muslim scholars say the excavations violate Al-Aqsa's sanctity. Israeli officials say the work will not harm the structure of the mosque, which dates from the seventh century.

"We are facing a dangerous action. Jerusalem's Muslim and Christian holy sites are dear to all Palestinians. Israel is trying to take advantage of the Palestinian internal conflict to commit its crimes," Meshal said.

Fighting between Hamas, which is backed by Syria and Iran, and the Fatah faction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has killed some 80 people since December.

Meshal, who lives in exile in Syria along with several members of the Hamas leadership, confirmed he was heading to Saudi Arabia this week to meet Abbas to try to end the strife.

"The situation does not afford failure. I say to Abu Mazen [Abbas]: we have no option but to succeed," Meshal said.

On Holocaust memorial day, Israel popular at UN

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Israel's United Nations delegation usually visits the towering General Assembly hall en masse only to fend off the latest accusation of wrongdoing.

So it must have felt bizarre for Israeli Ambassador Dan Gillerman to have to pause for applause more than a half-dozen times in the course of an address.

But Jan. 29 was no ordinary business day at UN headquarters. Hundreds of Holocaust survivors and their families gathered at the world body for its second annual day commemorating victims of the Shoah.

"I vow that as long as there is an Israel and I vow that forever there will be an Israel you are not alone," Gillerman told survivors, his voice rising. "You are safe. And today, here in this hall and around the world, the whole of the civilized world is vowing this vow together with you."

"As long as there is a United Nations, Israel is not alone," responded the UN's undersecretary-general for communications and public information, Shashi Tharoor, who presided over the Jan. 29 event.

The reversal of normal UN proceedings was near total. Where most deliberations are conducted with excessive formality in a half-empty chamber, Jan. 29's highly emotional commemoration was filled beyond capacity and featured musical selections by Hazamir, the international Jewish high school chamber choir, and the recitation of Kel Maleh Rachamim and the Mourner's Kaddish by a noted New York cantor.

Many men wore kippot, wisps of Yiddish and Hebrew could be heard above the din, and a bearded Chabad rabbi roamed the hall searching for men willing to don tfillin.

Survivors sat at the central tables normally reserved for UN ambassadors, while the envoys filled seats around the perimeter designated for non-voting observers. A Jewish non-governmental organization occupied the space reserved for the Palestinian delegation.

"The Holocaust was a unique and undeniable tragedy," said the new UN secretary-general, South Korea's Ban Ki-moon, in videotaped remarks.

Ban was en route to Addis Ababa for a summit of the African Union where, he said, ending the violence in Darfur would be high on the agenda, a comment that drew applause from the survivors.

For those on hand Jan. 29, the event was more proof of the UN's growing recognition of the significance of the Holocaust. But it also provided fodder for critics of the United Nations who charge that the organization is more comfortable honouring dead Jews than with protecting live ones.

Speakers invoked the various themes typical of Holocaust memorials: the duty to remember, the condemnation of Holocaust denial, the importance of education and the vows of "Never again."

Efforts were made as well to broaden the memorial to include other victims of the Nazis, including homosexuals, gypsies and the disabled.

Thomas Schindlmayr, who works on disability issues for the UN's department of economic and social affairs, told the assembly that the disabled still suffer at the hands of societies that deem them less worthy than their more able-bodied peers.

Representatives of the Roma and Sinti, gypsy communities who with 12 million members make up Europe's largest minority, held a press conference at UN headquarters to condemn the discrimination they face, particularly in eastern Europe.

But the central theme of the day was the fate of the Jews, whose mass murder was noted in the 2005 General Assembly resolution establishing the Holocaust commemoration.

Simone Veil, a Holocaust survivor and first president of the European Parliament, in her keynote address recalled how she survived Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen.

Marie Noel, a student at St. Elizabeth College in New Jersey, described her recent visit to concentration camps in Poland.

"I saw, I smelled, I touched and I felt," she said.

At a side event on Holocaust denial organized by B'nai B'rith International, Alcee Hastings, a Democratic member of the U.S. Congress from Florida, lashed out at Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Hastings called for Ahmadinejad to speak with Holocaust survivors and visit Israel's national Holocaust museum, Yad Vashem.

"We should not tolerate this fool, and we should all call him out, in the vernacular of today's young people," Hastings said. "It offends me personally, as it should the rest of society."

The International Day of Commemoration of the Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust was established in November 2005 by the UN General Assembly.

This year's commemoration, observed two days after the designated date of Jan. 27, was the centrepiece of a week-long series of events that includes an art exhibition, a lecture, two film screenings and the publication of a discussion paper by Yale University professor Ben Kiernan.

It also came after a resolution, introduced by the United States and co-sponsored by 103 nations, calling on countries "unreservedly to reject any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, either in full or in part, or any activities to this end."

The measure was adopted last month by consensus, with only Iran disassociating itself, calling the move a "hypocritical political exercise" intended to deflect attention from Israel's "atrocious" crimes.

While most speakers that day did not name Iran as the inspiration for the resolution, Israel's representative was not as circumspect.

Four paragraphs into his prepared remarks, Gillerman noted that while the international community had recognized the universality of the Holocaust, some countries remained intent on denying it.

"While the nations of the world gather here to affirm the historicity of the Holocaust with the intent of never again allowing genocide, a member of this assembly is acquiring the capabilities to carry out its own," Gillerman said.

"The president of Iran is in fact saying: 'There really was no Holocaust, but just in case, we shall finish the job.'"

In related news, the Jewish Telegraph reported that the British city of Bolton, in greater Manchester, had cancelled a planned event to mark Holocaust Memorial Day because of local Muslim pressure.

Instead, in line with the policy of the Muslim Council of Britain, which rejects the memorial day, the city, which had marked the day for the past three years, decided to hold a "Genocide Day" in June that would also recognize "the ongoing genocide and human rights abused of Palestinians" by Israelis.

Jewish leaders voiced concern that no one from the community had been consulted on the measure.

After widespread outcry, and led by a non-Jewish member, the council reinstated the Holocaust commemoration, though it said the genocide day will go ahead in June. Representatives also said Muslims didn't call for the original decision.

Manchester Jewish leaders expressed hope that the genocide day would focus on the Holocaust and other recent genocides and not be used a tool to exploit the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

Nasrallah: Hezbollah gets arms from Iran

By JACK KHOURY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd. ©

TEL AVIV — Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah is willing to receive aid not only from Iran but also from Muslim countries that have diplomatic ties with Israel, such as Egypt, and states that are considered moderate, such as Saudi Arabia. He also said it's no secret that Iran is aiding Hezbollah by sending money and weapons via Syria.

Nasrallah's remarks were published in an interview in the weekend issue of the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Rai Al-Aam. The interviewer, Saad Eddin Ibrahim, said he met Nasrallah last week in Lebanon. Ibrahim, a vocal critic of the Egyptian regime, is the chair of Cairo's Ibn Khaldun Center for Development Studies.

Nasrallah told Ibrahim that his organization kidnapped Israeli soldiers Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser in order to effect the release of Lebanese prisoners being held in Israel, but he admitted that he had made mistakes.

"Perhaps we erred. Only God does not make mistakes, and we have apologized to the Lebanese people for this and have paid a heavy price in blood," Nasrallah said. "We do not hesitate to sacrifice our children in the name of our righteous struggle."

According to Ibrahim, Nasrallah denied any ambition to be a pan-Arab or pan-Islamic leader, or even to lead Lebanon.

"My agenda is based on one principle: ridding the oppression and injustice from which the Shiite sect in Lebanon suffers and turning the Shiites into genuine partners in leading and creating the state, and removing the Israeli threat," Nasrallah said.

Israel Briefs

Iranian agents caught?

Fatah fighters claimed to have captured seven Iranian weapons experts during fighting with Hamas forces in Gaza on Feb. 1. Fatah claimed that at least some of the Iranians were chemical experts, Ha'aretz reported. Fatah forces also claimed to have seized some 1,400 guns and missiles at the site of the clash, at Gaza's Islamic University. The reports of Iranian involvement could not be confirmed, however, and Hamas officials denied it. Ephraim Sneh, Israel's deputy defence minister, said he could not confirm the specific report from Islamic University, but said it was consistent with Iranian involvement in the Palestinian areas.

Israel targets rockets

Israel is developing a system to shoot down short-range rockets used by Hezbollah and Palestinian terrorists. The Defence Ministry said it had commissioned a new anti-rocket system from the Israeli arms firm Rafael. The system, provisionally named "Iron Cap," will use miniature missiles capable of shooting down the Katyusha rockets favoured by Hezbollah in Lebanon or the Qassam rockets fired by Palestinians from Gaza. Security sources said Iron Cap will be ready by 2009.

Free Pollard: ex-CIA chief

A former CIA director said he thinks Jonathan Pollard should be released. "My view is that a 20-year sentence is enough," James Woolsey, who directed the spy agency from 1993 to 1995, told Arutz Sheva, an Israeli radio station. "The close relationship between the U.S. and Israel, a democracy, is also a consideration." Pollard, a former U.S. Navy analyst, is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel.

Astronauts visit Israel

Two North American astronauts were in Israel to attend memorial services for the first Israeli astronaut. Ilan Ramon was killed in the 2003 Columbia space shuttle crash. Steve MacLean from the Canadian Space Agency and Joseph Tanner from NASA were scheduled to take part in memorial events last week for the Columbia crew. "When Ilan was in space, we all felt the excitement and uniqueness of his task," said Rona Ramon, the astronaut's widow. "Space captures the imagination. I am glad to be with Steve and Joseph today, who are good friends who continue to perpetuate Ilan's memory." The Columbia burst into flames after re-entering Earth's atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003. All seven crew members were killed.

Yad Vashem gets Farsi site

Yad Vashem has launched a mini-website in Farsi. The launch was intended to help commemorate the UN-designated International Holocaust Remembrance Day. The museum also launched temporary exhibits in European cities, including Vienna; Dresden, Germany; and Montpelier, France.

First gay couple registered

Jerusalem officially registered its first homosexual couple as married some three months after the High Court of Justice ordered that same-sex couples be listed in the Interior Minister's Population Registry. Binyamin and Avi Rose were married on June 28 in Toronto.

Envoy blasts campus critics

An Israeli diplomat said it was "unfortunate" that Jewish groups sponsored a campus tour of Israeli soldiers who accuse the army of human-rights abuses. "The willingness of Jewish communities to host these organizations and even sponsor them is unfortunate," said a report by Los Angeles Consul General Ehud Danoch sent to Israel's Foreign Ministry and all Israeli envoys in North America. "This is a phenomenon that must not be ignored." At least one Jewish group has called for the Union of Progressive Zionists, a co-sponsor of the "Breaking the Silence" tour – which came to Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and London, Ont.– to be removed from the Israel on Campus Coalition, whose goal is to improve Israel's image on college campuses.

Egypt accuses Israel of spying

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Just as it was hoping for an Egyptian breakthrough on the Palestinian front, Israel has become embroiled in spy allegations by Cairo.

Egyptian prosecutors announced over the weekend that they had charged a local man with spying for the Jewish state. Like past Egyptian allegations of Israeli spying, this one could turn out to be a fabrication for domestic consumption, intended to prove that Egypt – despite a 30-year-old peace treaty with Israel – is no friend of the Jewish state.

According to the indictment, the main suspect, Mohammed al-Attar, was recruited by Israeli agents in Turkey in 2001 and spied on Egyptians and other Arabs there. He later immigrated to Canada, where the Egyptian prosecutors said he continued gathering intelligence for Israel.

Israel denied knowledge of the affair.

"We only know what we have heard in the media," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said.

Egypt's state security prosecutor charged Attar and three Israelis with spying. Attar, who also holds Canadian citizenship, is under arrest, while warrants have been issued for the Israelis. Egypt's state news agency, MENA, identified them as Daniel Levi, Kemal Kosba and Tuncay Bubay. Kosba and Bubay also hold dual Turkish citizenship, MENA said.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, when speaking about Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts after hosting German Chancellor Angela Merkel on Saturday, did not mention the spy allegations.

Mubarak did note the chaos in the Gaza Strip, where dozens of people have died in recent fighting between Palestinian factions, and said the Palestinian Authority (PA) must get its house in order before it can hope to establish neighbourly ties with Israel.

On Sunday, Hamas and Fatah tried yet again to implement a ceasefire after violence that flared late last week left at least 27 people dead. "What is happening now is an intra-Palestinian problem, and the Palestinian side cannot sit with the Israeli side while they have internal differences," Mubarak said.

The Egyptian leader further called on Palestinian gunmen who last year abducted an Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, to release him as part of rapprochement efforts.

Hamas, the terrorist group that runs the Palestinian Authority cabinet and legislature, has the final say on Shalit's fate. Mubarak's comments suggested that his sympathies are with the rival Fatah faction of PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

There's good reason for this: Hamas is an offshoot of Egypt's fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood, which represents the most serious domestic challenge to Mubarak's iron rule. He has an interest in seeing Hamas fall in favour of the more moderate Fatah.

Reality show 'ambassador' promotes Israel in Diaspora

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Toronto was Eytan Schwartz's first stop on his year-long trip across North America, England, and Australia as winner of Israeli Channel 2's most popular reality TV show, The Ambassador.

"I loved Canada," says Schwartz, 32, who competed against 13 other young Israelis on the show, from September to December 2004, to win the opportunity to represent Israel abroad via New York-based advocacy group Israel at Heart.

Schwartz, an entertainment journalist who was born in New York and moved to Tel Aviv with his family when he was seven years old, says his familiarity with the Diaspora, his strong English-language skills and his media background helped him win.

Schwartz spoke to Jewish communities in Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, London and Montreal. "In general, Canadians were so much more knowledgeable about Israel and other global affairs than their American counterparts," he says.

After Canada, Schwartz went to the United States, where he spent most of his time delivering speeches to university students at college campuses, Jewish communities and churches as well as the media.

"People are either ignorant about or uninterested in Israel," he notes. The students on campus – which comprised about 70 per cent of Schwartz's audiences – either had no exposure to Israel at all, or related to the country exclusively in terms of news media portrayals, whether from a pro- or anti-Israel perspective.

Eytan Schwartz

"The image of the country is extremely one-sided. For most people, Israel conjures thoughts on politics, military, terrorism – basically, all things miserable," he says. "Most have never seen anything real, positive, or human, coming out of Israel. Most don't think of it as a real place – it's not a destination that you would want to go to, and it's not a place you'd like to hear music or watch movies from."

According to Schwartz, the overwhelming impression among both Jewish and non-Jewish college students is that "Israel is the opposite of 'cool.'"

Interestingly, says Schwartz, Brazil's image is the opposite. When people think of Brazil, the first thing that comes to mind is beaches, good-looking people, fun, sun and great music. In fact, it's a very complex and dangerous country.

"This proves to me that a country can have a very serious security issue, and nobody thinks about it, because that's not the image the country is trying to portray."

That is why Schwartz aimed to expose audiences to the "cooler" aspects of Israel – the country's contemporary art, pop culture and nightlife – aspects he is familiar with as an entertainment journalist, a career that began in the radio unit – Galei Tzahal – of the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF).

"My objective was to give audiences something about Israel that they wouldn't get anywhere else," says Schwartz, who studied anthropology at Columbia in New York, earning his BA in 2002.

Who is to blame for the one-sidedness of Israel's image abroad? Schwartz says the first and most obvious culprit is the foreign media.

"It's a very complicated situation here, and I don't think the media does a good job of explaining what is really going on," he says.

"I am wary of saying that there's a disposition [among media] to criticize Israel [unfairly]. I don't think criticizing Israel is always anti-Semitism. Sometimes it's just people criticizing Israeli policy."

He adds that people blame Israel's Foreign Ministry for the country's negative image abroad, "but they have a limited budget, and there is just so much they can do. They are currently in the process of trying to re-brand Israel's image, but they can't be everywhere."

He says The Ambassador was such a popular show because "people really thought that one of us was going to save Israel's image, and that everybody's going to like us now. It's something that people really felt strongly about.

"No matter what we do, we are afraid of how the world will see it."

Schwartz says Diaspora communities also perpetuate an unbalanced impression of Israel because they hire speakers who discuss "the conflict," rather than other sides of the country.

He says Jewish organizations on campus tend to alienate all but a fraction of the Jewish student body. For instance, says Schwartz, in his three years at Columbia, he only once stepped into the Hillel building on campus.

Sir Bob Geldoff and Eytan Schwartz

"It's changing and improving now, and with the advent of Chabad on campus, Hillel is doing more general cultural and social justice stuff," he says, "But back then Hillel wasn't a home for all Jewish kids on campus. It was perceived as a place for religious, right-wing, Jewish kids to congregate."

That's why Schwartz was adamant about not holding his talks in Hillel or other Jewish organization buildings on campus. "A lot of Israel programming is done in the Hillel building, meaning that it will only attract the kids who are already associated with Hillel," he says.

Many Jewish students are unfamiliar with the "basic facts" about Israel, he adds.

"There was always a core of Jewish kids that were extremely active and interested. But there were many more who either couldn't care less about Israel, or who said that they didn't know the first thing about how to respond to anti-Israel rhetoric. This is especially dangerous, since most Palestinian kids on campus are very well educated."

So, what needs to be done? In Schwartz's view, the most effective solution is birthright israel. "It's extremely expensive, but having Diaspora youth visit Israel is bar none the single best advocacy tool."

At home, Diaspora communities need to learn what he dubs "the art of advocacy."

"You need to know the facts, but the facts are not enough alone. You have to relate to people on a personal basis – for instance, by exposing them to a different side of Israel, like art and culture – one that they might be interested in," he says.

Israeli history also provides a wealth of useful advocacy tools. For instance, Schwartz recalls how impressed Asian students were to hear the story of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, who in the 1970s, granted Israeli citizenship to a boatload of 300 Vietnamese refugees. "When I would tell them this story, their eyes would light up."

Grassroots efforts can also have a big impact. "Even the smallest actions can make a difference," he says.

The worst cases of anti-Israel activity on campus, for instance, don't take place at big, Ivy League universities, but at small community colleges, where one student invests all his time in anti-Israeli activity. "That one person can make the entire difference, just as one person doing something pro-Israel can make all the difference in the world."

Since he returned to Israel in April 2006, Schwartz has been involved in many grassroots advocacy efforts. In addition to his job as co-host of the show Haolam Haboker (The Morning Show) on Channel 2 and working on his master's degree in Middle Eastern Studies at Tel Aviv University, Schwartz works as a consultant for a number of pro-Israel organizations and political figures on advocacy and media performance. He also gives guided helicopter tours of Israel to foreign reporters through The Israel Project, a non-profit organization that provides resources for international journalists.

He has become involved in advocacy on behalf of the 250-odd refugees from Darfur who arrived in Israel after escaping the Sudanese genocide. The majority of them are being held in Israeli jails.

"When I returned from my trip abroad as ambassador, I decided that I was going to try to change something – one thing that is happening in Israel, that I care about deeply, and this was it," he says.

He is lobbying the Israeli media to cover the issue. "From a hasbarah perspective, if Israel treats these 250 people well, we will have earned an ace. It's not only about doing the right thing as human beings. It's about doing the right thing as the Jewish state, and it will also benefit our image."

Play explores tragic life of Danish resistance fighter

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The Danish Play is the true story of Agnete Ottosen, a Danish poet and resistance fighter, written by Sonja Mills, who is related to the heroine.

A Nightwood Theatre production, The Danish Play runs from Feb. 22 to March 17 at the Young Centre for the Performing Arts in Toronto's Distillery District.

"The play is about my great-aunt, a woman who I had heard about growing up because she was this hero in the Danish resistance," says Mills, who has had a dozen of her plays produced.

"It wasn't until 10 years ago when I started writing the play that I got a glass of wine into my mom one night and got her talking. She had just received from her sister in Denmark, my great-aunt's diaries, which were left to my mom when my great-aunt died in the '60s, but for some reason, her sister hung onto them."

The first act of The Danish Play takes place in 1943 during Hitler's last push to round up Jews; the underground hid the country's Jews and successfully found boat passage for almost all of them to Sweden. In addition, the king of Denmark stood up to Hitler's decree of making Jews wear a yellow star by wearing one himself. In fact, the entire country followed suit, making it impossible for the Nazis to find the country's Jewish citizens.

Ottosen was living in Aalborg at the time; she helped with this mass exodus and saved many, many lives. In 1944, the resistance fighter was called to Copenhagen, but was captured by the Nazis within her first week in the city. The first act ends when Ottosen is sent to Ravensbrück, a women's camp that was near Berlin.

Sonja Mills

It was what Mills has devoted the second act of her play, Ottosen's struggles after the war, which struck a chord with the playwright. "When she came back from that internment in 1946, she had been operated on, sterilized and tortured. She never was mentally okay after that," Mills says.

"She came back after the war and decided she wanted to have a baby. She went through a series of operations to regain the ability to have a baby. She had a baby, but the baby was promptly taken away from her by the Danish government. The story that really hit home to me was the story of her trying in vain to get her child back."

This is the second mounting in Toronto of The Danish Play. The first took place in December 2002, after which it toured through 2003 and into 2004, going to Copenhagen, where it was well received before coming back to Canada and playing Edmonton and then Ottawa's National Art Centre.

Mills, who lives in Toronto, started her career as a playwright in 1994 with a quirky comedy called Dyke City. She says Nightwood's production of The Danish Play is a dream production with a dream cast. The original cast of seven, including Kate Hennig, who stars as Ottosen, remains the same except for two actors, Clinton Walker and Clare Preuss. Preuss, who is Mills' wife, is now part of the cast, which Mills considers family. In fact, Mills' mother has adopted actor Christine Brubaker, who was pregnant during the play's first Toronto run.

"The reason I'm so in love with this play, because I'm not always in love with everything I write, is when we first produced this play, [U.S. President] George [W.] Bush was threatening war in Iraq," Mills says. "Then, when we mounted the play in Copenhagen, Denmark had joined in the war in Iraq. When Denmark joined this war, I was horrified because it is a historically peaceful country and we just don't do things like that.

"For us to be going so blindly into this war, without thinking about what happens to people after the war – not the ones that die, but the ones that live – they have no life.

"I was glad to know that this play existed during that time because it is a very anti-war play. It is a play about the futility of war and the real personal attrition that happens as a result of living through something like that," Mill says.

HBO picks up U.S. version of Israeli psycho-drama

By SUSAN KARLIN

TEL AVIV — When Noa Tishby moved from Tel Aviv to Los Angeles, it was to make it as an actress.

Two years later, she's now a history-making producer, spearheading the first original Israeli TV drama series to be picked up by an American network.

Last month, HBO ordered a full season of an American version of the hit Israeli show In Treatment – called "BeTipul" in Hebrew – a half-hour drama about a therapist and his patients. The U.S. version stars Gabriel Byrne as a calm pillar of stability with his patients who turns angry and insecure with his own therapist, played by Dianne Wiest.

Actor/producer Mark Wahlberg (of HBO's Entourage) serves as executive producer; writer/director Rodrigo Garcia (of HBO's Carnivale and Big Love) as executive produce and showrunner; and Tishby as co-executive producer. Completing the cast are Josh Charles, Embeth Davidtz, Mia Wasikowska, Melissa George and Blair Underwood.

While Israeli pop culture has been making increasing inroads into the United States – this year alone, filmmakers Gal Uchovsky and Eytan Fox will release their latest effort The Bubble in the United States, and stateside tours are planned by musicians Ivri Lider, Idan Reichel and author Etgar Keret – the television industry has remained elusive.

But in a business wrought with false promises and dead ends, the speed and ease with which In Treatment made it to the United States, and Tishby went from actress to groundbreaker, can only be described as charmed.

The cast of the Israeli In Treatment. Says Noa Tishby, "Anyone who's ever been to therapy – that's the way it really is. I just knew it should be seen in America."

The journey began in November 2005, when Tishby returned to Tel Aviv for her niece's bat mitzvah and In Treatment was the talk of the town.

"It was the most brilliant concept for a TV show I'd heard in my life," says an exuberant Tishby in a mastered American accent. "It was a nightly soap, with no flashbacks, background stories or guest stars. Everything happens in the therapy room, which creates an intense environment. It's one of the most voyeuristic things I'd ever seen. Anyone who's ever been to therapy, that's the way it really is. I just knew it should be seen in America."

Tishby, already a famous actress and singer in Israel, snagged the mobile number of the show's creator, Haggai Levi, through her Israeli agent. "I'm calling about your show – but it's not what you think it is," she told him, quickly allaying his concern that she was pitching herself as an actress. (Levi, now working on the second season of the Israeli In Treatment, is also an executive producer on the HBO show.)

By sheer luck, Tishby had just signed with Leverage Management, the same firm that represents Mark Wahlberg and his HBO comedy, Entourage, a biting satire of fame and the movie industry. Last summer, Leverage took a subtitled version to HBO, which ordered an initial five episodes, before greenlighting another 40 last month.

"None of this could have happened without [Leverage founder] Stephen Levinson," says Tishby. "He has such an incredible vision and championed it all the way. It's so amazing that he trusted me. I had just started working with him, so I wasn't sure how all of this would go down. But it's been like working with your friends. It's really about the art and making great television, and that's why the relationship is so powerful."

Though production is expected to start in a couple of months, HBO has yet to set an air date and decide whether to air the 45 episodes five nights a week for nine weeks, as they appeared on the Israeli digital cable channel, Hot.

In that presentation, the therapist would counsel a different patient – one couple, a teenage girl, one woman, and one man – in subsequent episodes for the first four nights of the week. On the fifth, the psychiatrist would see his therapist, unveiling a very different side of himself.

While keeping mum on how the show has been tweaked for U.S. viewers, Tishby allows that the storylines and emotions are similar.

"People are people, no matter where they are. Their pain, anger, love and dilemmas are the same."

Ironically, Tishby – who has appeared in the Dreamworks film The Island and U.S. TV shows such as CSI: Miami and Nip/Tuck – will not perform on the HBO series. But her newfound producer status and position as a conduit to the Israeli creative community may help its TV industry become an incubator for larger markets.

"I think this particular program will show the world that Israel can be a provider of art, and not just be about technology and war," she says.

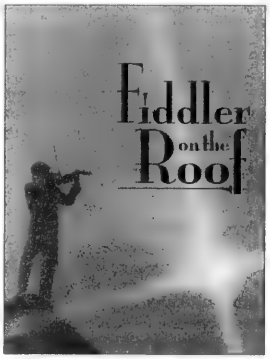
Fiddler DVD set brings back tradition

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The shtetl of Anatevka has entered the 21st century. Fiddler On the Roof began with a story that was made into a play and then a film, and now comes the two-disc DVD, which includes a disc of featurettes of never-seen footage, or at least not seen in almost four decades.



The 1971 movie directed by Norman Jewison starred Chaim Topol as Tevye the Dairyman, and quickly became a classic for its memorable melodies and timeless storytelling.

But the film as we know it might never have happened. John Ritter, Marlon Brando and Frank Sinatra were reportedly considered for roles, says the disc's production notes.

John Williams, a few years before his landmark-career compositions for Superman, Star Wars and Jaws, helped bring the music "to life" in Fiddler. Williams, interviewed in the special feature Creating a Musical Tradition, describes the task of broadening the orchestra to 80 pieces for the silver screen, from the Broadway version of 30 instruments.

A rare treat is a behind-the-scenes movie about the movie, the National Film Board of Canada's (NFB) "making of" a 50-minute feature, in which Jewison laments that his $9-million budget for Fiddler was not "a lot of money."

Over-budget and behind schedule, he wasn't entirely sure if his efforts would prove to be successful.

"If Fiddler doesn't make it [as a hit], maybe there's that television spot in Toronto," said the Canadian filmmaker. "I hope the gentiles like it."

At the first producer's meeting, Jewison thought that his hiring as director had something to do with his last name. He presumed they thought he was a "Jew's son."

"What would you say if I told you I was a goy?" he recalls asking United Artists executives, whose jaws immediately dropped. Jewison's family is in fact from York, Great Britain, and he speculates that if there were any possible remote connection to a Jewish family tree, "the last stronghold of Jews there was in 1215, and they must have assimilated."

In this NFB feature, Jewison is caught badly singing off-key with the actors, spotted lip-synching some words behind the camera, and then moved to tears filming one of the musical numbers.

"I identify with the Jewish religion," he said. "I spent time in Jerusalem and have deep feelings for Judaism."

Topol, so impressed with the director's knowledge of the Jewish people, admitted that Jewison knew more about Judaism than he did. "We were thinking of changing the director's name to Norman Christianson," he quipped.

For the film, shot in Zagreb, Yugoslavia (now Croatia), local villagers, using sawmills, were enlisted to help build the sets and turn old barns into makeshift synagogues. Of particular fascination to Jewison was the locals' nonchalance toward the plethora of cameras, microphones and props. "If it was filmed in New York, New Yorkers would have gawked," he said in the featurette. But the locals went about their business because "they had work to do and had to make a living."

Other extras on the DVD include the sepia-tone cemetery dream sequence as it was originally filmed in full colour, Sholom Aleichem stories read by Jewison, and a deleted song, Any Day Now. Sung by Perchik (Paul Michael Glaser) the student revolutionary, it was later replaced by the romantic/idealistic Now I Have Everything.

A common thread among the many features' talking heads is the timelessness and universality of the story. Screenwriter Joseph Stein said that he was once asked by a Japanese producer, "Do they understand this show in America? Because it's so Japanese."

He acknowledged what others in the featurettes had also said: "Of course, I realized it was pretty universal... the show involves conflict of generations, breaking of traditions and adjusting to hostile environments."

A government agent is having the worst day of his life – wrongly incarcerated and tormented by his jailer, he has less than 24 hours to stage a prison break, prove his innocence and find true love . . .

SOPRANO DENISE WILLIAMS LAUNCHES CD OF BLACK AND JEWISH MUSIC

Soprano Denise Williams and friends launch Walk Together Children, her new CD featuring a mix of black and Jewish music, as part of Black History Month. "There is a deep affinity between the historic struggles of blacks and Jews, and a rich common ground in their music as well," she notes.

Miles Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. $20. Sunday, Feb. 11, 3 p.m. 416-924-6211, ext. 0, or www.denisewilliamssoprano.com

Tale of Old Toronto: A review in these pages two weeks ago of Brad Schreiber's book Stop the Show! A History of Insane Incidents and Absurd Accidents in the Theater put me in mind of an incident that occurred back in the early '20s at Toronto's own Standard Theatre (later the Victory) on Spadina Ave. at Dundas.

The fare was a Yiddish play that featured a blacksmith scene and a live horse. Two or three hours before it was due to step into the theatrical limelight, the poor beast was tied in a lane behind the theatre and left to shiver through a cold winter night without a blanket. Summoned by police, an inspector from the Humane Society inspector came and led the horse away to a warm stable.

As the blacksmith scene neared, the stagehands went out back for the steed and became frantic to see that it was gone. No substitute could be found on such short notice, so the curtain had to be brought down; the show, in this case, could not go on. No doubt the company remembered to be kinder to animals in future.

Names in the News: It has been a year since the naked mutilated body of a 23-year-old Jewish man was found near the railroad tracks at Ste-Genevieve-des-Bois, France. While the brutal kidnapping, torture and murder of Ilan Halimi has dropped from the news, it has remained very much in the thoughts of retired Toronto businessman and author Hy (Harry) Burstein, who is contemplating a book about the shocking crime. To this end, he is planning a research trip to Paris in the spring.

"Fifteen boys picked on this kid, kidnapped him and tortured him for a few weeks," he said. "As soon as I read about it, I was drawn to the story. I said, 'I gotta do something on this, to let the world know.'"

At 78, Burstein has an unusual writer's profile, since he only picked up his pen several years after his retirement as head of a plastics company in Brampton. His first book was the autobiographical Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy (2004), describing his passion for horseback riding and his riding adventures all over the world. Next came a novel, Unforgiven Anger, which is set both in Ontario and Israel; he has been to Israel often and his wife is a former Miss Israel. He has also privately published a book of philosophical, political and religious thought.

Scene from Adama Meshugaat, or Sweet Mud

Burstein reports that Unforgiven Anger is currently being looked into by several movie producers in Los Angeles. "I'm hoping the book might be adapted into a film," he said. Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy and perhaps his other books are available in select stores and through amazon.com and other web portals.

Israeli Film News: Unlikely as it sounds, the Tehran Film Festival has reportedly requested to screen an Israeli film.

The film is More Than 1,000 Words, a joint Israeli-German production about an Israeli photojournalist covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The opportunity of showing it in Iran "raises our tremendous success in the world by a thousand levels," said Ziv Koren, the photojournalist whose story is followed in the film.

"This is an exceptional opportunity to show the Iranians a film about life in Israel. The film doesn't deal with my work as a photographer. It serves as a mirror for Israeli society and presents my feelings as a human being who lives in Tel Aviv. I hope that the human message will get through."

It was not immediately clear why the film was selected, but its Israeli director, Solo Avital, suggested it might be a sign that there are growing voices in Iran who want to know more about Israel and don't necessarily agree with the current regime's policy.

Also in the news is the Israeli film, Adama Meshugaat, or Sweet Mud, which took the World Cinema jury prize for drama at the 2007 Sundance Film festival. A top-grossing film in Israel this year, Sweet Mud is the country's foreign entry in the Academy Awards. It tells the story of a young Israeli boy coming of age on a kibbutz while trying to provide emotional support for his depressive mother.

Also at Sundance, a special jury prize went to Hot House, directed by Shimon Dotan. The documentary looks at how Israeli prisons have become a breeding ground for the next generation of Palestinian leaders as well as the birthplace of future terrorist threats.

Appreciating what you have Gratitude. Appreciation. What powerful words. What is great about your life right now? What is working? What are you deeply grateful for on a daily basis?

I love the story that Sarah Ban Breathnach tells in the book Everyday Greatness by Stephen Covey. She writes about a terrible head injury she sustained, and then being bedridden and partially disabled for a year and a half.

Ban Breathnach lost many of her senses as a result of the injury. She couldn't taste her food or smell her daughter's hair after it was washed. She couldn't even listen to music or speak on the phone because it made her dizzy and confused. Months after her accident, she smelled the delicious wafts of spaghetti and meat sauce being made by a kind friend, and she experienced deep appreciation and gratitude that she never forgot again.

She writes: "For the next few happy weeks, I rediscovered life with same sense of wonder as my little girl. Biting into a ripe, juicy peach. Listening to music. Seeing bright sunlight stream through a window. Being able to wear my favourite sweater. And naturally, cradling my daughter in my arms again. I was astonished and ashamed at my appalling lack of appreciation for what had been right under my nose. All these years later, I strive to make each day a passionate experience, one in which I take time to savour life's textures, tastes, sights, sounds and aromas. Through the power and grace of gratitude, you, too, can do the same."

What is so beautiful about this story is that it illustrates the importance of staying in a place of appreciation and gratitude and it shows that you feel abundant when you are able to stop and notice all the blessings in your life.

Jack Canfield, in The Success Principles, says: "Another important reason for being in a state of appreciation as often as possible is that when you are in such a state, you are in one of the highest vibrational emotional states possible. You are appreciating what you do have instead of focusing and complaining about what you don't have. And because the law of attraction states that like attracts like, you will attract more abundance – more to be thankful for – to you. It becomes an upward-spiralling process of ever increasing abundance that just keeps getting better and better."

Oprah Winfrey talks about gratitude a lot on her television show. She popularized The Gratitude Journal by Ban Breathnach. In the book, Ban Breathnach suggests that you list five things that you are deeply thankful and grateful for that happened that day. I often recommend that my clients make such lists.

I have taken that idea a step further with my children. For years now, I have asked them, before bed, to tell me five things they are grateful for. I am always so touched by their answers, especially when they say something like "this moment right now."

Most of can't remember who won Academy Awards for best picture or best actor or actress in the last five years. But we always remember the people that really care about us and make a difference in our lives. Think of five teachers who believed in you or encouraged you, five friends who have come through in difficult times, five people who taught you something valuable at work, or five people who made you feel appreciated and special. There is no greater gift than appreciating all that you have.

My favourite quote comes from Covey who says, "People with everyday greatness are quick to exhibit everyday gratitude. They do not take life or the kindness of others for granted. They are eager to say thanks and the first to express praise. Many have found the best sleeping pill comes from counting one's blessings, naming them one by one."

Try to acknowledge and appreciate at least five people everyday, and write down what you're grateful for every night before bed.

And remember to acknowledge yourself for who you are, for all that you do, and all that you dream of being and becoming. Then you can step into the magnificent light where you deserve to be.

Well-researched book probes history of Hamas

Hamas: Politics, Charity, and Terrorism in the Service of Jihad* by Matthew Levitt, Yale University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, surprised everyone, including itself, by defeating Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago last month. Pundits expected Hamas to make substantial gains but were dumbfounded when it roared to victory and, in the process, altered the parameters of Palestinian politics.

Founded in December 1987 during the earliest days of the first Palestinian uprising, Hamas is a force to behold in the Gaza Strip and, to some extent, in the West Bank.

Militantly anti-Israel and committed to Israel's destruction, Hamas strives to be recognized as the sole representative of the Palestinians, a distinction held by the Palestine Liberation Organization since an Arab League conference in Rabat in 1974. But it remains to be seen whether it will be able to achieve that objective, given its refusal to recognize Israel, renounce terrorism and abide by agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority.

Apart from its rejectionist position on Israel, Hamas seeks to create an Islamic state and roll lack the tide of secularization in Palestinian society.

For an organization whose following had never exceeded more than about 30 per cent of the population, Hamas has indeed come a long way.

Matthew Levitt, the author of Hamas: Politics, Charity, and Terrorism in the Service of Jihad, ascribes its appeal to several interrelated factors.

In a sea of corruption, Hamas has not shown itself to be corrupt. As well, Hamas provides social welfare services that the Palestinian Authority has not always delivered, even during the best of times. Finally, Hamas has been able to hurt Israel, the common enemy, through suicide bombings.

In this well-researched account of its history, Levitt, a senior U.S. government official, debunks Hamas' fatuous claim that its armed and political wings are separate entities.

Both wings, he writes, "are tied together in an organic whole, with the political wing providing the guidance and the religious justification for the suicidal attacks against Israelis in buses, restaurants and shops."

Levitt's argument is still valid, despite the fact that Hamas has drastically curtailed such attacks since its accession to power on Jan. 25, 2006.

Levitt, the deputy assistant secretary for intelligence and analysis in the department of the treasury, says that Hamas uses its political and charitable organizations as a financial and logistical support network for its terrorist activities. These organizations support terrorism by glorifying acts of violence and providing a safety net for Hamas militants and their families.

He points out that its recruitment efforts are run through its charity committees, mosques, student unions, sports clubs and summer camps. Mosques play a special role, serving as safe houses and meeting places for Hamas fugitives.

Hamas is an outgrowth of the Palestinian branch of the Egyptian-based Muslim Brotherhood, which was founded in 1928 by Hassan al-Banna. Banna's brother, Abdel Rahman, established a branch in Palestine in 1935 to further the Palestinian national cause, protest the British mandate and fight Jewish encroachments.

Muslim Brotherhood recruits fought in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war and participated in postwar raids on Israeli settlements. During the 1950s, Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser suppressed the Muslim Brotherhood, but in Jordan, it was co-opted by King Hussein. After the Six Day War, Israel tolerated Islamic activists, regarding them as a useful counterweight to the PLO.

According to Levitt, Hamas carried out its first terrorist strike against Israel in December 1991, when it murdered an Israeli settler in the Gaza Strip. "This attack marked a turning point in the modus operandi of Hamas and set the group on the road toward the spectacular and indiscriminate suicide bombings and other attacks for which it is now well known," he observes.

Hamas perpetrated its first suicide attack in April 1993, when one of its operatives set off a car bomb near Mehola, a Jewish settlement in the West Bank, killing an Arab worker.

On April 6, 1994, Hamas carried out its first strike in Israel, murdering eight civilians in Afula.

With the onset of the second intifadah, Hamas stepped up the pace of its attacks, killing 377 people and wounding 2,076 from Sept. 29, 2000, to March 24, 2004, in 52 suicide bombings.

Levitt does not venture beyond that cut-off date, but Hamas took responsibility for more such attacks after 2004. It was not really until 2006 that Hamas seriously cut back on suicide missions.

As Levitt notes, Hamas rejects peace with Israel on religious, nationalist and ideological grounds.

Its charter states that "there is no solution for the Palestinian question except through jihad." He adds that its leadership has not softened its rhetoric since last January's election, but he neglects to mention that Hamas favours a long-term truce if Israel meets certain conditions.

Interestingly, Hamas disputes the Muslim Brotherhood's view that the umma, the Muslim nation, must first be brought back to the "true path" of Islam before it can confront "infidels," particularly Israel.

During the late 1980s and early 1990s, Hamas and its more radical rival, Islamic Jihad, were at loggerheads over a number of issues, including what relationship should be established with Iran. But since the 1993 Oslo accords, they have set aside their differences and worked together.

Levitt estimates that Hamas' total budget ranges between $30 to $90 million (US) per year. The funds are raised throughout the Arab world and elsewhere. A substantial portion of donations are channelled through its charitable network, which subsidizes the families of "martyred" suicide bombers.

For a while, Hamas was reluctant to deploy female suicide bombers. But that taboo was jettisoned when Hamas realized that it could exploit cultural and religious conventions of modesty by using women to smuggle weapons, ammunition and explosives under their robes.

Hamas has long co-operated with Hezbollah, says Levitt, whose book was published on the eve of last summer's war in Lebanon. "Both organizations see politics, charity… and terrorism as viable, legitimate tools to pursue their goals," he writes in an apt summation of their methods.

Barring unforeseen developments, Hamas will continue to be a formidable force in the years ahead. That probably being the case, Levitt's volume should serve as valuable primer of a Palestinian organization that has definitely left an impression in the Middle East.
